Attend San Francisco's First Automobile Show

COLISEUM FEB. 18TH TO 25TH

San Francisco's first Automobile Show and first exhibition of any kind since the fire—a counterpart of the Auto Shows held in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and other large Eastern cities. In brilliancy and splendor it will surpass any exhibition ever attempted in San Francisco.

Coliseum is the largest exposition building west of Chicago, 120,000 square feet devoted exclusively to displays of 1907 models in automobiles, also the latest in accessories and sundries—the exhibits represent a valuation of one-half million dollars.

Show to be of educational as well as commercial value—features of interest to the general public as well as the motor enthusiast.

Special R. R. rates from any California point—fare and one-third for round trip—get receipt from your local ticket agent.

A Bishop's Temerity

The hardihood of Bishop William F. Nichols of the Episcopal Church is astonishing. When a clergyman of his rank hazards his reputation as a Conservative Force in the community he gives us pause. It was no doubt in a friendly spirit, a spirit animated by something bordering on affection, that he took occasion during the course of a public address the other day to animadvert upon our "unenviable notoriety for graft" and the "flaunting of our vices." His remarks were more frank than amene, and they were open to a construction prejudicial to the character of our municipal Government. Indeed they might easily be construed to be in justification of the prosecution of the grafters. Now we all know that the prosecution of the grafters has been stigmatized as a foul and malignant conspiracy, and that the widely disseminated stories of graft have been pronounced the vicious inventions of a corrupt and an indecent press. Yet from Bishop Nichols' utterances, mild and almost non-committal as they were, we should judge that eminent clergyman is in sympathy with the so-called conspiracy and that he has little respect for the judgment, or fear of the hostility of the distinguished citizens who are incensed at the outrageous machinations directed against the peace and dignity of the Hon. Eugene Schmitz and the Hon. Abe Ruef. The temerity of Bishop Nichols is in strong contrast with the reticence of other Church dignitaries who have seen fit to maintain a discreet silence throughout the awful revelations of civic corruption and the manifest evidences of the city's debasement.

Benefit of Clergy

"St. Francis," said Bishop Nichols, "might wonder why our city, with its box of Municipal Woes wide open, had not been named after Pandora instead of after him." We are inclined to think that if St. Francis were given to speculation he would occupy himself principally with the phenomenon of so much vice in a city containing so many clergymen. The founder of the Franciscan Order was the world's second great exponent of the simple life. We earnestly commend to all clergymen the study of his career that they might model themselves after him. For it is our impregnable conviction that if all clergymen were of the sweet, poetic temperament of that mild, ascetic monk there would be fewer grafters in the world. Schmitz and Ruef might never have fallen into their present plight if their clerical intimates had exhibited half the religious zeal that led to the canonization of Francis. The salient feature of St. Francis's character was his profound faith in the goodness of human nature. He believed that robbers of the highway were more good than bad and he talked with them and compassionated them on their inability to give rein to their holiness. His theory was that the bad in them had fortuitously gained the ascendancy, and though some of them mocked him there were others to whom the nobility of his character appealed. There was no task too stupendous for that holy monk if it involved the welfare of one of God's creatures. The man that interceded with the Emperor in the interest of "his little sisters the larks" would not have observed with tranquility the wayward course of Mayor Schmitz under the ciceronage of Abe Ruef. Nor is it likely that with all his faith in the goodness of human nature he would have assumed in the face of the obvious that all the stories were fictive which had their inspiration in the debauching of this fair city.

They Want Titles

There is a hot fight on in the navy between the staff officers and those of the line and all because those of the staff are avid for titles. There are two classes of officers in the navy, those of the line, from the grade of midshipman up to that of Admiral, and staff officers, the latter being officers of the pay department, of the medical department, of the department of construction and the civil engineers, coming under the bureau of yards and docks. In other words, the officers who have to do with actual fighting are line officers, and the others, including pay officers, surgeons, civil engineers and naval constructors, are staff officers. The engineers used to be staff officers, but they have been made a part of the line of the navy. Under existing laws titles, such as Ensign, Lieutenant, Lieutenant-Commander, Captain, etc., are not given staff officers in the navy, as are staff officers in the army, and they claim that they should be. They have relative rank but no title. Thus an assistant surgeon has the rank of a Second Lieutenant; a passed assistant surgeon the rank of a Lieutenant, senior grade; a surgeon the rank of Lieutenant-Commander; a medical inspector the rank of a Commander, a medical director that of a Captain, while the Surgeon-General has the rank of a Rear Admiral. But none of the officers in these grades is permitted to use the title. If an officer is a medical inspector he is called Medical Inspector So-and-so, and not Commander. In the army a surgeon, for instance, is entitled to the title of Major. Last summer, when it was determined by the Navy Department that something should be done about the commissioned personnel of the navy, the staff officers were asked for suggestions. A personnel board, headed by Assistant Secretary of the Navy Newberry, was appointed to take up the entire matter. The staff officers who were consulted, however, did not follow the line expected. It was supposed they would confine their recommendations to matters concerning promotion, increased pay and such things, but instead all of them turned in recommendations that they have the right to make use of the titles. The line arose against this, and since then there has been a hot fight on. There were other recommendations made by the staff officers, and these were granted, but their suggestions that titles be given them was held back and not sent to Congress with the other conclusions of the personnel board. And now the staff officers are blocking the personnel bill and President Roosevelt is so indignant that he sent word to them that if caught lobbying they would be court-martialed. What the President wants and what everybody interested in the welfare of the navy wants, is to increase the efficiency of the line. The personnel bill is designed to secure better material for the command of fleets, squadrons and individual ships, to abolish the system by which the country gets flag officers who have survived their efficiency. The personnel bill will correct many flagrant imperfections, and though it is in no way prejudicial to the interests of the staff officers they have exercised their political pull so adroitly that the President is having a hard time getting it through in view of the fact that there is no dispute respecting the merits of the bill. It is no wonder that President Roosevelt is indignant; for the opposition to a measure designed to improve the efficiency of the navy, coming as it does from men in the service of the country, is a species of treason.

The Friars and the Indians

Elbert Hubbard, known to the culturines as the sage of East Aurora, has been disclosing his knowledge of the Californian Mission style of architecture. He says: "So impressed were the monks by the dangers of earthquakes, that it affected their architectural designs. The Mission style is a building that is built with earthquakes in mind—broad at the base, very simple, solid, and usually but one story high. The lofty steeples, vaulted roofs, overhanging battlements and ornate features of the old-world cathedrals were not repeated by these Spanish monks. They calculated on God's displeasure." To Fra Elbertus it has not occurred that there were other things upon which the missionary laborers had to calculate; on such trivial things, for example, as lack of tools and building materials such as were available to European architects, not to mention the lack of skilled labor. When they used rawhide thongs instead of nails it was not to propitiate God but because they had no nails. All things considered they did pretty well and their work was not devoid of ornament. Nor were they prejudiced against two-story buildings, a fact of which Fra Elbertus would not have been ignorant had he seen some of the early mission settlements. If the Monks had calculated on God's displeasure the probability is they would also have calculated on God's ability to reduce any building to ruins, but it appears that they went in for durability. If they had calculated on earthquakes it is not likely that their edifices would have abounded in arches. The fact is that in designing their buildings they calculated only on their capacity and resources, and their handiwork has survived in a measure not only the ravages of time but the displeasure of God so far as that displeasure has been expressed in earthquakes. It is easy to disparage the handiwork of the friars, but their achievements should command the highest admiration. From the time of the first settlement until the secularization there elapsed approximately sixty years, about the duration of one lifetime. In that brief period more was accomplished toward the betterment of the natives than in all the other years of the occupation of this country by Christian civilization. The Government has expended in round numbers a billion of dollars nominally for the benefit of its wards, but what is there to show for it? We have Carlisle football teams and basketball matches, and Indian schools are a perennial source of copy for magazine scribblers, but where today is the skilled Indian workman, capable of self-support and independence? Latin and Greek, mathematics and zeal for athletics are crammed into dusky skins, but the occupation which appeals to the noble red man is an engagement with a Wild West show or an Indian village of some Exposition. Despite the reprehensible belief of the ignorant and superstitious Franciscans, they did teach their wards many skilled trades, amongst them that of curing and tanning leather, making saddles and other horse gear, weaving cloth, breeding and caring for livestock, planting and harvesting grains and fruits, the building of houses and making of furniture, besides such elementary education as they were capable of absorbing. It never was the intention or expectation to turn these naked savages into disputatious theologians, but only to make of them as good Indians as was possible. The wisdom of the design has demonstrated itself, since, today, after four hundred years of experimenting, the wisest heads in the Indian department have come to virtually the Franciscan conclusion, namely, that the Indian must remain an Indian to the end of time and the proper course to pursue is to give him such instruction and assistance as will enable him to become independent, to make and mend his own tools, to plant and harvest his own crops, and to take his place in his own world.

The Temporary Library Scheme

The proposition to erect a temporary building to house the city library should be frowned down. It is simply a pretext to throw away money and furnish pickings for the favored ones. The excuse is made that the McCreery building which is now the headquarters is overcrowded, and doubtless it is, but the proposition to provide a permanent library building is not one which has been suddenly conceived. On the contrary, it is a good many years since some of our municipal philanthropists took it upon themselves to beg a donation from Andrew Carnegie. Plans have been discussed time and again, and the site has been chosen. There is no occasion for any dawdling about the matter. The money needed to purchase plans, erect a temporary building, provide furniture and remove and arrange the books should make a considerable showing in the cost of a permanent housing place. We all know only too well the intolerable delays and the unexpected increase in the cost of every job undertaken by the Municipality, and it is safe to say that the tentative sixty thousand dollars which it is proposed to expend will double and treble itself before the end is in sight. It is not to be expected that municipal employees will content themselves with anything short of the most expensive furnishings that the market can supply, and when the permanent library is finally erected such articles as have been in use for a few years cannot possibly do further duty, nor will they be sold for the benefit of the library funds, for city property has an unaccountable way of slipping through the cracks of the floor, and it ill becomes a wealthy community to take picayunish note of a few dozen mahogany chairs and desks, leather covered couches and such trifles. Perhaps the patrons of the library are somewhat crowded in the present quarters, but they will be obliged to make the best of such accommodation as there is while the temporary building is being put into condition for occupancy, which will take fully one year from the day the work is actually begun, and they will have another period of upheaval when the next move is made. We are all pretty well inured to hardships just now, and can struggle along for a while with better grace than we will submit to additional burdens later on. If the McCreery library is overcrowded, there is the Mission branch which is ill-supplied, and some of the superfluities could be transferred thus equalizing the benefits which are supposed to be for all.

More Money For Frills

There is a bill before the Legislature designed to increase the school funds ostensibly for the purpose of relieving the congestion in our schools. It would be well if before the passage of the bill we were given absolute assurance that the congestion would be relieved. And probably no better way could we be given such assurance than by legislation designed to eliminate from the school department all its fads and fancies. More money would mean, we fear, more high priced and incompetent specialists, more visiting physicians and nurses, more athletic grounds, shower baths and other luxuries which have no connection with school work. For some years before the fire the grandchildren of the first generation of native sons and daughters attended the same ramshackle shells which sheltered their grandparents, receiving instruction in the dark basements of firetraps, while the more favored ones reveled in luxuries akin to those that constitute the charm of private clubs. Instead of raising the maximum age of school children from seventeen to twenty years it would be better to contract the period in which public instruction is available. Children would advance more rapidly if their minds instead of their voices were cultivated, and if there were less voice cultivation of the public school kind there would be more voices available for proper development in later years. Less time should be given to water-color painting and more to the multiplication table, and the boy or girl who has not been able to complete the grammar school course by the age of fifteen, should, unless a full year has been lost through unavoidable absence, be held to have forfeited further right to instruction at public expense.

The Old and New Systems

Instead of offering inducements for longer attendance and greater ease the best course which educational authorities could countenance now would be to establish an age limit beyond which no child could remain in the grammar school, restrict the number of pupils admitted to the high schools each year, and charge a substantial tuition fee for a college course. What is difficult of attainment is invested with a value. Thirty years ago, when our schools were by no means overcrowded, there was a regulation under which no pupils were eligible to admission to the high schools unless they were at least fourteen, and it was by no means a dead letter. A rule providing for a junior class of not more than one hundred would infuse more enthusiasm into the work of our languid and lackadaisical pupils today than the present open door with the allurements of athletics and Greek letter fraternities and an abundance of flirtation and no demands on mental capacity. The boy who left the grammar school a generation ago, well grounded in the fundamental rules of arithmetic, able to spell ordinary words according to accepted standards, and able to write legibly and speak grammatically, with some knowledge of geography and history had a broad basis on which to build. He could go into a commercial house and climb the rungs of the ladder, or he was ready for an additional course in a business college, or for the high school. He played baseball in the back lot for exercise and fun, tinkered more or less with tools, and was raw material ready to hand wherever he was wanted or saw an opening. It was assumed by both parents and school authorities that at fourteen or fifteen that much at least would be accomplished: There are university graduates of today who are not worth as much. The boy who leaves the high school today, at nineteen, after being supported in ease at the expense of his parents, is fit for nothing but to matriculate at a university where he can gain honors as a member of the athletic team, and when, after four years of additional idleness, he is finally turned loose on the world, he is often better prepared for the career of a professional sport than for anything else. Collis P. Huntington once said he could hire all the college graduates he wanted for thirty dollars a month. The secretary of the New York Young Men's Christian Association is authority for the statement that one-fourth of the applicants for relief, those who are unable to do anything for themselves, are college graduates. When all is said and done we still need "the common man," the one who can do the ordinary work of the world well. The whole theory of our educational system is that it makes better citizens, but what is there in our present educational system that tends to purify the electorate? In the occasional glimpses we are afforded of college life we are unable to detect anything denoting the operation of a system for the disciplining of the heart and mind. The students, by their general conduct, do not persuade us that they have learned the benefits of temperance and moderation. On the contrary we have received the impression that life with them is a feast of selfishness without care or thought for others. We doubt that they are informed respecting the weakness of human reason, its province and its limits and we wonder by what secret process they are being fitted for the highest citizenship.

Perspective Impressions.

Senator Sanford's proposed measure for the regulation of lobbyists is unconstitutional, being in restraint of commerce.

A Dublin audience having mobbed a Yeats play for its libelous portrayal of Irish character, it is easy to understand why Yeats is lauded in London for his pictures of Celtic life.

One circumstance that should reconcile New Yorkers to the abandonment of "Salome" is that Olive Fremstad was to play the title role. Olive is the lady who was Carusofied in "Carmen" one night that was made memorable by what happened in the gray dawn of the morning after.

William J. Bryan, the irrefutable, dropped into town the other day, decided the legal question involved in the Japanese school case and dropped out again. No need of a Supreme Court while we have the Nebraskan with us.

A New York jury gave a man a verdict, the other day, for $3,000 damages for the alienation of his wife's affections. He sued for $75,000. Clearly a case of overestimating the value of affections that are susceptible of alienation.

"Taft's Brother Boosting Him;" was the headline in a daily paper. "Boosting" is not a good word to describe the performance. When you use a derrick you "hoist."

The Interstate Commerce Commission reports that "the ruin of its competitors has been a distinct part of the policy of the Standard Oil Company." This effort at giving color to a popular delusion must be very painful to that pious, philanthropic gentleman, Mr. John D. Rockefeller.

If official incompetency were a crime it would be unnecessary to employ a Burns or a Heney to fit the Supervisors to striped suits.

If the Gridiron Club is all that it is said to be then the members should be pleased with the way that President Roosevelt brought his performance into concord with its best traditions.

Barren Ways

By Mabel Porter Pitts

This that we hold we craved: No passing day
Marked off in shade or sun but sped our prayer,
And not a temple built upon our way
But, at some moment, found us suppliant there.

Sincere, we asked, not imitating those
Who credence give to every mood that pleads,
And from the earnestness of hope arose
The true incentive to ambitious deeds.

Our prayer was heard; the gift which night and noon
Had filled the empty circle of the skies
Proved like that flower which blows beneath the moon.
Which lives in coldness and in darkness dies.

We have received, and are as one that seems
To have the favored goal yet still to win;
As one who sits outside the door and dreams
While wastes the banquet of his life within.

We meet with Pleasure, and her banal kiss
She gives as earnest of a lambent fire;
Our plea is answered, and we turn to this—
Dead, sodden ashes of a vain desire.

Sown In Corruption

Roughly, in great clods, the ground had been broken up long before in preparation for the great burying. Piled up, the uncouth blocks lay open to the sky; light and the fresh wind filling the wide crevices, and flooding down to the dark places of the deep trench. The gravedigger's wrestling with the earth is over; he has made the bed; he has now only to soften and smooth it out fit for those who are to lie there in a long sleep. So he is upon the ground early on the day of burying. Not one will be put in a bed unmade, or made carelessly, and he will leave none unburied. The day shall not pass till all are lying in their places. There shall be no hurry, no scamping; the coverlet shall not be smoothed hypocritically over a single one of them, put away unlovingly, rudely, in tumbled, unsweet, unaired bed. He may not be learned in legends of the unburied Shades; he has never heard of unquiet souls stretching hands to cross the Styx. But he does know that if he leaves any one of them exposed unburied, it can never rise in glory. His theology is not scientific but he has faith, and because he has faith he works; resolutely, calmly, happily. All round him there is decay and corruption; death in a thousand forms. Where there is life, it is stricken life; the blackened leaf, dropping here and there almost silently, sometimes as it were with a sigh, as the wet wind carries it about before it sinks finally to the ground. A few palsied flies; honey-bees infirm with the cold; the last butterfly wandering alone; a flower or two that have lived too long, and seen all their compeers die. How different it all is from the heyday of summer life! The feeble gnats, attempting a pitiful dance in the thin, chilly mist that rises as the light drops, but emphasize the failure of life. It gets colder. One might shiver in the damp clammy air of falling evening. Everywhere is the dank smell of decaying vegetation; more pungent as night comes on and only the morbid brightness of fungus spots shows out. The sky is turning to the hard rusty color of early winter twilight; but there is still light enough for the gravedigger to do his work. One by one he lifts them and puts each carefully in its own place. Gently he lays them in; thoughtfully, almost reverently. He seems to be trying to make them comfortable; as he would tuck up a child in bed, for he knows that if they do not sleep well they will never wake. At length the last one is in its resting-place, before it is quite dark. The last one is put out of sight and the earth closes over. Nothing now is left but to draw the coverlet and smooth out the creases. A last look and, turning, he leaves them there alone to the earth, to the elements, to Him who gives the increase, and walks slowly home in the dark and the cold and the damp.

But he does not see it; he sees another world than this. He has sown in corruption but he sees the rising in incorruption; the fresh spring air; and the new green; everything springing to life; the world is born again. Where he has just closed in the earth, he sees a host azure and snowy white and crimson rising to the light. As the wind plays with the tall hyacinths, he can almost hear their numerous bells ringing. He sees tulips flaming in the sun, catching bright dewdrops in their cups; and a great multitude of daffodils, nodding gaily, dancing and swaying to and fro. Their trumpets, he fancies, are lifted to sound the call to life. To him the sowing in corruption is not sorrowful; for the gardener has faith.

The First Fourth of July Celebration at Pickeye

By the middle of '51 Pickeye had grown to such importance that a befitting observance of the national anniversary was deemed in order.

Accordingly a committee, composed of the representative men of Pickeye and its vicinage, was appointed to make arrangements for a grand celebration.

Some of their names may seem lacking in dignity, but a man's real name was seldom known or used in the mines at that date: his camp designation was sufficient.

The committeemen were General Houston, a professed lawyer of imposing mien and floodgate eloquence, whose military title had evolved spontaneously from his surname; Elder Beals, an itinerant Methodist preacher, who drifted into the camp with the first rush of prospectors and had become a fixture and notable character; Pap Grimshaw, the leading merchant and the only man with a family in Pickeye; Arkansaw, an energetic cattleman; Dobie Joe, a miner from Lang's Bar; J-B, another miner from the dry Diggings, and Cape Ann, a miner also, but from up the river.

The Fourth of July dawned bright and glorious as it can dawn only in the mountains of California. Pickeye had been astir early, but it was ten o'clock when Arkansaw and his aids, gaudy in trappings and superbly mounted, rode slowly up the main street, followed by the brass band.

Elder Beals had been named chief of staff, for his proficiency with the tin horn he carried to summon his congregations; and now, as the cavalcade halted at the plaza, he sent forth the assembly-call with a vigor that awoke the echoes like a calliope and told the inhabitants the celebration was on.

It would require a pen skilled in spectacular description to limn that pageant. The Pickeye division led. Arkansaw and his staff headed it, followed by the brass band and a mounted squad of prominent citizens. Then, elaborately decorated and drawn by six white horses, came a car of state, in which Mrs. Grimshaw posed as the Goddess of Liberty, and her daughter Cosey as California. After them marched a long line of townsmen, six abreast, in blue flannel shirts and bearing flags.

The Lang's Bar division came next, led by Dobie Joe and keeping step to the strains of a horse-fiddle mounted on a wagon—a big dry-goods box, across the edges of which two stalwart men kept sawing with a scantling, producing an ear-splitting and unearthly noise. Then followed a float, on which two men were working a long-tom, succeeded by hundreds of other miners on foot and carrying picks or shovels on their shoulders.

The Slate Range representatives, gray-shirted, as if dyed with that they worked in, were next in line, under the guidance of J-B and a callithumpium—an extraordinary instrument emitting more extraordinary sounds—followed by a float on which a couple of men were at work with a rocker, and ending with a long file of marchers carrying buckets.

The Red Banks delegation came in succession, red-shirted, and with a siren and a hydraulic outfit in full blast; the river contingents, with a monster bell and a string of sluices; and at the end of all there trailed a horde of Indians and Chinamen.

The only drawback was acknowledged to be that everybody was in the procession, so there was no one to look on and admire. But there was a partial compensation in the counter-marching, when they could see and cheer one another.

For three hours the patriotic citizens paraded the streets of Pickeye, and then they assembled in the plaza to listen to the literary exercises.

The invocation by Elder Beals and the reading of the Declaration by Dobie Joe were nothing out of the ordinary, but the oration was something marvelous.

The term "spell-binder" was not in existence then, but the fervid oratory it implies existed; and if there ever was a spell-binder it was General Houston. He not only bound but spiked the attention of his hearers that day. He snatched the signers bodily from their forgotten graves; he rescued the name of Washington from oblivion; he spread the American eagle over the whole universe; he fought England; he reconquered Mexico; he convinced Pickeye that she was invincible though the combined armies and navies of the world should come against her; and in a peroration that fairly electrified his audience he materialized, as it were, the Genius of the Southern Mines standing on the summit of the Sierras with an awed and admiring world crouched at his feet.

Alas for the evanescence of extemporaneous oratory. It passes like a breath, leaving no token of the sorcery which thrilled a thousand breasts. General Houston never committed his oration to paper, so its beauty and magnificence are lost to posterity.

But fortunately the poem of C. Augustus Dinkey, the young Foothill Bard, is extant. He was painstaking and carefully preserved everything he ever wrote. Therefore patriotic hearts may be stirred even now by the fervid lines he recited on that occasion.

FOURTH OF JULY ODE, 1851.

This day the eagle-bird should soar
And anvils belch and cannons roar;
The flag should wave, the armor shine,
And citizens form into line.
With drums and fifes and what you will—
And Pickeye's done it up to kill!

The memories of this glorious day
Enthuse my soul in such a way
It makes a queer goose-pimply brash
Break out on me, like canker rash.
Who doesn't have it? Everyone
Must feel the same when Lexington
And Bunker Hill and all the rest
Of them there battles is expressed.
We fit with England then, the cur,
And knocked the stuffing out of her;
And if she wants to try the game
Again, she'll find us here the same,
Not only ready for the fun,
But eager—for we owe her one!

Van Ness and The Welchers

Though Mr. T. C. Van Ness met his Waterloo the other day there has been no grief to assuage that I have been able to discover. And yet there has been weeping over the catastrophe. If conditions were the same as in the old days when wet weather in London was denoted by turned-up trousers in America, we should have abundant proof of the dampness caused by the copious tears of Mr. Van Ness's welching clients; but, alas! those with whom turned-up trousers were formerly en regle are now wearing their pants in their laced boots. Mr. Van Ness is the gentleman who addressed a wonderful piece of periphrastic literature to the creditors of the British earthquake-clause companies some months ago. Having been hired by those companies to enable them to facilitate the evasion of their obligations he began the delectable job by assuring the creditors that they didn't have a leg to stand on. He told them his clients didn't dare to pay out any money because they would be pecuniarily responsible to the stockholders. He asserted that the legality of the position of his clients was so firmly established he was incredulous respecting the rumor that San Francisco judges and juries would decide against them through sympathy with the policy-holders. Thus did this eminent member of the bar naively intimate that if defeated in court he would be constrained to assume that justice had been perverted. And a little later the policy-holders were notified that the welchers had kindly condescended to make them objects of charity by paying them a small percentage of their claims. How these scrupulous men managed to do this and evade the pecuniary responsibility of which they were so fearful I have never been able to ascertain. Whence their authority to give away the funds of the companies is something the learned Mr. Van Ness has not seen fit to disclose. But to enlighten the policy-holders more than was absolutely necessary to carry out the welching scheme in hand was not the purpose of Mr. Van Ness when he constituted himself the oracle of justice in the first instance. He merely uttered himself as the welcher's attorney, but he affirmed the finality of the earthquake clause with the dogmatism of one from whose judgment there was no appeal.

When Bergin Went At Him

The simple, unadorned truth is that Mr. Van Ness, through his unfortunate ignorance of the law, aided a gang of financial pharisees in preying upon the necessities of the policy-holders of the Norwich Union, the Commercial Union, the Alliance Assurance and Palatine Insurance companies. Those policy-holders that did not rush in to avail themselves of the generosity of the welchers were, in the course of time, warned that the offer would not be held open indefinitely. By this species of intimidation those unfortunates that did not relish the prospect of litigation finally accepted the terms. Mr. T. I. Bergin, being a lawyer with money to burn, was not to be deluded by his distinguished confrere of the bar. He declined to accept the law as misinterpreted by Mr. Van Ness. He deemed it preferable to prove that gentleman's position untenable and for that purpose employed a lawyer somewhat more eminent in the profession than

Mr. Van Ness, one Garrett McEnerney who defined the law so clearly, and so completely demolished the frail edifice of sophistries designed and reared by Mr. Van Ness that when the trial was over it was inconceivable that anybody ever really believed the insurance companies were exempt from general liability under the earthquake clause. It was a notable defeat that Mr. Van Ness sustained and one to which there should be an aftermath.

Moral Responsibility

While it is generally understood in these degenerate days that there is not so much call for the lawyer who can tell his client what the law forbids as for the one who can impart knowledge of how schemes may be carried out in spite of the intention of the law without involving the schemer in trouble, there should be some redress for those who are victimized through such machinations as were employed by the British welchers. When Mr. Van Ness without solicitation constituted himself the legal adviser of all the policy-holders he persuaded many that they had no legal claim against the companies. He so affirmed in his published letter. It turns out that his statement of the law was somewhat inaccurate, and that those British welchers are now at least morally indebted to every person in this city to whom they were legally indebted after the April fire. And I am not sure, in view of the methods employed to induce a compromise, they are not still legally indebted; for the whole thing, in the light of the law as set forth in the Bergin case, savors of a bunko game. But the familiar proverb of the law that there is no wrong that hasn't a remedy has proved in recent years scarcely more substantial than a dream. If there be a remedy the policy holders will not rely on Van Ness's judgment as to what the remedy is; for it appears that he sometimes errs, and it is a matter of profound regret to his friends that in doing so in this case he has probably disadvantaged himself professionally in no small degree. He is on record as the lawyer who declared the insurance company directors would be pecuniarily responsible for paying the claims of policy-holders, but who saw nothing wrong in giving away the money of the stockholders. And he is on record as the lawyer who failed to make good in court, the consequence being that his clients have been put on record as men that repudiate their honest obligations and prey on the necessities of their creditors. It is to be hoped for Mr. Van Ness's sake that he received a very big fee from the welchers. It would be hard to estimate offhand the amount of money that would compensate a lawyer for the loss of prestige sustained when his cocksureness is blown full of holes in such a blinding white light as that which beat upon Mr. Van Ness at the crushing close of the Bergin case.

They've Dissolved Partnership

It may interest Mr. Van Ness to learn that there are members of the bar somewhat curious to know whether it was the magnitude or the minitude of the fee which he received from the welchers that proved disastrous to his copartnership with his son-in-law, Mr. William Denman. It was just before the fire that the copartnership was established. And it was just a little before the formation of the copartnership that Mr. Denman formed a matrimonial alliance with the Van Ness family. Shortly after the firm of Van Ness & Denman came into existence Mr. Van Ness went off to Europe to spend a little of the fee that he got out of the Davis will contest, and during his absence his law business was handled by his brilliant son-in-law. It was while Mr. Van Ness was abroad that the fire occurred which brought dismay to the stockholders of British insurance companies, and the San Francisco attorney lost no time in making professional connections with the officers of those companies. He returned to San Francisco without giving the slightest hint respecting the intentions of his clients, but he was then in a state of perturbation and shortly after his arrival was delivered of that ponderous message to the policy-holders wherein he pleaded the earthquake clause as an impregnable universal expedient for the confusion of creditors. Up to that moment the firm of Van Ness & Denman was intact. There were no signs of a rift in the lute. A little later, in certain cases, the name of T. C. Van Ness was substituted for the firm name of Van Ness & Denman. This transaction excited curiosity in the profession, but it was explained that Mr. Denman was going to devote all his time to admiralty practice. As he has been making a specialty of admiralty law and with great and gratifying success, the explanation was accepted, but a short time ago came the news that the profession contained another ex-partner of T. C. Van Ness, the firm of Van Ness & Denman having dissolved January first. And by this news was curiosity again filled. Why did they dissolve? is the question that has been afloat for some weeks. Was the insurance fee so large and the prospect for more so good that Van Ness concluded he didn't need a partner? or, was it so small that he couldn't afford to divide it even though the division should all be in the family? But of course these questions will never be answered. It's a purely family matter anyway, and curiosity is vulgar and should be discouraged.

Luring Lights

Shock and fire cannot destroy the love of San Franciscans for their city. Graft disclosures do not make the hills that overlook the bay and ocean less desirable to live upon. The corruption of mere men cannot change our town's environments, or kill its traditions, or rob it of its gayety and joyousness. Although not in the foregoing words, it is in that strain that a correspondent writes me of returning to his beloved city. "Ever since the fire I have been exiled," he writes. "I have been no farther than Alameda, and I have been in San Francisco every week day. But that is not living here of nights. The lights lured me back. For months on my evening trips across the bay I could see nothing but the wreck-strewn hills. As the days grew shorter the ruins that littered them were hidden by darkness ere I crossed the bay, and were black against the Western sky—as they were half a century ago. Then came the pioneers of 1906 and built houses where they had lived before. And the lights began to shine of nights. There were only a few of them at first—a beacon here and there; but there was lure for me in every one of them. Week by week they became more plentiful, until at last the hills began to twinkle as they did a year ago. By their light from the deck of the ferry-boat I could almost pick out the streets that arch the hills and go out toward the ocean. There, in my imagination, the old city stood. 'The city of my love and my desire,' beckoning for me to come. I knew that only its shadow remained, that everywhere were blackened walls and heaps of bricks. But the lights lied to me, as I wanted them to lie, and tempted me to perch myself upon one of the city's hills again. 'Things are almost as they were before,' the lights told me—so I came. I miss much. I cannot see the long blaze that used to define Market street, the flashing lamps along Kearny and Powell, or the yellow haze over O'Farrell street. As I look down from the hill at night the lights are scattered and spectral. By day there is naught but confusion to gaze upon. But through the confusion the new town is arising—and day by day I watch it rise, and rejoice that I am back upon the hill,—a pioneer of the second generation."

Wrecks of the Street

The current boom in mining stocks recalls the old Comstock days, when the whole town went wild—and mostly broke—over shares. This time, so far, there has been only a few disastrous fluctuations. The tendency has been mostly upward, and nearly all stocks have been good stocks. Mackay, Fair and Flood were the arch manipulators of the Comstock days, and shares went up and down as they willed it, to the ruin of those who had guessed wrong. Women by thousands were among the victims. Financial ruin did not cure all of them of the gambling fever. Many kept at it with every cent they could beg, or borrow, or save through bitter self-deprecation. Some of them are alive yet, and hang around the doors of the Exchange, living sermons on the fatal passion for gambling. They are not a pleasing sight. Old, ragged, toothless, shambling and dirty. They wait around the entrance listening for words of wisdom that might drop from the lips of operators or brokers. Their eyes glitter with the fever of chance, they scan the face of every man that comes out, strain hideously for every word that is uttered. They would be known as women only by the clothing they wear. They are creatures, nothing else, and but one thought possesses them—stocks, stocks, stocks! More than one young fellow, tempted to plunge on a tip, has held himself back at the sight of these battered, mumbling wrecks, some of whom once had more than he could ever hope to possess.

The Boom In Bullfrog Rush

That the present craze will bring a new crop of dupes and financial wrecks there need be no doubt. The old game is being played over again. There is no game into which the "sucker born every minute" is more easily lured. It is so easy that anyone unburdened with a conscience and skilled in formulating plausible stories and giving verisimilitude to extravagant yarns may acquire a fortune by organizing a mining company on paper and floating the stock. How easy it is to play upon the greed of gold is illustrated by the experience of Frank S. Colton who recently brought suit for $41,000 against the L. M. Sullivan Trust Company. On the strength of glowing circulars and advertisements issued by the company, which reached Colton in his Pittsburg home, he purchased two thousand shares of the Bullfrog Rush Mining Company for which he paid $800.00. A few more circulars impelled him to take another chance. He paid $315 for seven hundred more shares, and then sat back to await results. Presently he received this telegram which must have cost a little money:

"Just returned from personal inspection of Rush properties. Fifteen feet of $30 ore opened on Rush vein, which has widened out to three hundred feet, and all will mill. Eleven hundred and sixty feet of tunnel work done to date in ore. Over nine hundred feet of Denver vein opened up and explored on this property. Considering fact that development work was commenced only ten weeks ago, showing is most phenomenal of any mine in Nevada. No such enormous body of ore opened up in the Montgomery-Shoshone at same stage of development. Rush bids fair to become greatest mine in State. Jack Campbell, our mining engineer, on the ground, and almost every miner on Bonanza Mountain buying this stock. Intrinsic value at this time not less than par. Full details by letter."

Getting In on the Ground Floor

The telegram was sent from Goldfield and it made Colton jump with excitement. A few days later he got a letter confirming the telegram and giving in more detailed form the great prospects of Bullfrog Rush. It seemed to Colton that he was being let in on the ground floor. He was bewildered with kaleidoscope of easy money in all the colors of the rainbow. Opportunity couldn't flirt with him recklessly without being embraced. He reached out for one hundred thousand precious shares, paying for this block the small sum of $40,000 and then he squatted in eager expectancy of endless dividends. But none came. Months went by and finally growing impatient the Pittsburger sent along a few inquiries to Goldfield. Back came the news that the L. M. Sullivan Trust Company regretted the failure of Bullfrog Rush to develop according to expectations. Now Colton believes that he was defrauded and he wants his money back.

The Case of Father Tyrrell

Among the Catholic clergy of this city the principal subject of discussion just now is the dismissal of Father George Tyrrell, one of England's best known Catholic writers, from the Jesuit order. Although this took place some time ago and was widely heralded in Great Britain as well as on the Continent, it was only recently that it became generally known in this country. An article in a recent issue of the North American Review on "Three Years and a Half of Pius X," purporting to be written by "A Catholic Priest" and consisting of a violent and intemperate arraignment of the public acts of the present pontiff, concludes with a statement of Father Tyrrell's case which is offered as the most damning evidence of Pius X's bigoted and despotic rule. Editor George Harvey of the Review is authority for the statement that the anonymous writer of this article holds a prominent and honored position in the Catholic priesthood of this country. Naturally speculation is everywhere rife as to his identity, especially in view of the fact that his statement of Father Tyrrell's trouble with his ecclesiastical superiors contains several misstatements of a kind to suggest the suspicion that the writer maliciously twisted the facts to make out his case against the Pope. Aside from the biased account in the North American only meager statements of Father Tyrrell's case have been printed, so the correct version of the affair will be welcomed by all who are interested in questions of Catholic church discipline.

A Friend of Archbishop Riordan's

The case of this English Jesuit has attracted particular attention in this city because Father Tyrrell is an intimate friend of Archbishop Riordan. When he was expelled from the Society of Jesus it was rumored that the Archbishop had invited him to join the secular clergy of this archdiocese and that the distinguished English priest, anxious to continue his sacred functions though dissociated from the religious order in which he was ordained, had accepted the invitation. As might be expected this rumor caused quite a flutter among the local clergy. Even those who knew Father Tyrrell only as a distinguished convert whose devotional and ascetical books are read by pious Catholics all over the English-speaking world, realized that his presence in a diocese where the Jesuits occupy an important position might lead to embarrassment, while those who were familiar with the details of his dismissal foresaw the possibility of a great deal of trouble. But Father Tyrrell did not come and subsequent developments have made it impossible that Archbishop Riordan or any other of his friends should empower him to pursue his priestly duties.

Facts of The Tyrrell Case

Here are the facts of Father Tyrrell's clash with Rome. They have never before been published in this country but may be relied upon as absolutely correct. Several years ago the late St. George Mivart whose essay on "Happiness In Hell" will be recalled as having involved him in trouble with the Roman Congregation of the Index, sought enlightenment from Father Tyrrell on certain questions of faith regarding which his mind was troubled. In reply Father Tyrrell penned a letter the purpose of which in his own words was "to dissuade my friend from that breach with the church which would mean an assertion of individualism and a denial of authority and corporate life." Most unfortunately this private communication passed out of the hands of Mivart and a version of it, somewhat garbled, was published after his death in the Milanese newspaper Corriere della Sera with the declaration that "in point of boldness the ideas of this Jesuit go beyond anything so far published by even the most advanced 'reformist' Catholics." Of course the letter obtained wide publicity and its pronouncement on certain relations of criticism and Catholic theology being at variance with the teaching of the church it soon reached the notice of Pope Pius X. The Pope wrote to the late Father Martin, General of the Jesuits, commanding him to expel Father Tyrrell. Unwilling to resort to such an extreme measure, Father Martin pleaded with the Pope and obtained the promise that if Father Tyrrell would repudiate the letter or show where it had been incorrectly interpreted, the incident would be closed. This Father Tyrrell refused to do, maintaining that there was no statement in the original letter which was not theologically defensible. Thereupon the letter was placed upon the Index and Father Tyrrell, on the seventh of February of last year, was dismissed from the Society of Jesus under suspension, that is to say, deprived of the privilege of exercising his priestly functions.

"A Much Abused Letter"

Father Tyrrell counts among his intimate friends the most prominent Catholics of England and a number of these, regretting exceedingly his rupture with the church, endeavored to arrange with the Pope for his retirement to some diocese where he might pursue his calling as a secular priest. It was at this time that the rumor got about that Archbishop Riordan was to receive him. Finally a Belgian Bishop announced his willingness to receive Father Tyrrell provided he would agree to submit any books he might write to clerical censorship. But Pius X, having in mind the fact that it was not one of the English Jesuit's books but a private communication which had caused the scandal, replied that Father Tyrrell would have to submit not only his books, if he wrote any, but also his epistolary correspondence to ecclesiastical supervision. To this condition Father Tyrrell would not assent, so he has remained under suspension and has published an account of his trouble in a tract entitled "A Much Abused Letter." Catholic churchmen, accepting the doctrine of papal infallibility in matters of faith, realize better than outsiders the logic of the Pope's position in this unhappy affair; hence their natural regret for the loss of a man of Father Tyrrell's cultured and scholarly attainments is not to be construed as approbation of the course he has seen fit to pursue. The viewpoint of "A Catholic Priest" as expressed in the extraordinary North American Review article is not the general viewpoint. And it may be added that they do not yet despair of Father Tyrrell's reconciliation.

Shocked By Salome!

Salome has shocked New York! Is it to be wondered at that in the school of nations we wear the Fool's cap? At this moment New York is pandering to the prurience of the nation through the medium of that lickerish theme the Thaw case with its sidelights on libidinous cults and paphian revels, and yet it throws up its hands in holy horror at the sound of the Strauss music that throbs with the passion of Oscar Wilde's beautiful dramatization of the Biblical story of the sacrificing of St. John the Baptist to the vengeance of Herodias. The objection this time is not that the theatre is consorting with loose and riggish letters or that Thalia has been lured again from the path of dramatic purity and transformed into a trull of the gutter. No, "Salome" is not open to either of these objections. The tragedy in musical dress has evoked a protest from two classes of zealous moralists—those to whom the music is a powerful sensual appeal and those who object to Wilde's treatment of a biblical theme. These moralists have not objected to "Parsifal" with its passionate rhythms and its mysticism through which suggestion of the Redeemer is subtly contrived though stoutly repudiated by the learned in symbolism. Neither have they objected to the Hall Caine play in which under cover of Biblical quotations put into the mouth of an hepatic murmurer, the porne-crastic fascinations of a concert hall are revealed. So long as hypocrisy is pandered to under the subterfuge of Art and indecency is exploited under the mask of dramatic technique, there is no objection to plays that exalt lust into love or that abound in devices for parading the turgid trade of harlotry.

Its Checkered Career

New York is not the first city in which there has been revolt against "Salome." That play has had a checkered career. Written in the French language by an Irishman it was first produced in Germany after being interdicted in London by that holy terror the British censor. But it was not produced even in Germany until after Wilde's death. He wrote the play for Sarah Bernhardt and she was to produce it in Paris, but his arrest caused her to abandon her plans. The Germans were the first to acclaim "Salome" a masterpiece, and a little later, London having outgrown its vulgar prudishness, the English translation of it was performed in that city, and the critics pronounced it the greatest of modern tragedies. Respecting the dramatic and literary merits of the play all critics agree, and of course so great a work of art is not to be denied the people of this country because of the protests of the self-constituted guardians of public morals. There is nothing in the play to appeal to the prurient. It is devoid of lewdness. It is the tragic story of a fierce passion, written with a sense of the stage that is not less sure than the sense of dramatic poetry. But there is one feature of the play, only one, to which objection might reasonably be made, and that on the score of physical disgust, qualms of which cannot fail to be aroused if they are not guarded against by shrewd stage management. The scene in which the head of John the Baptist is presented to Salome on a silver charger and in which she kneels and kisses the lips of that head, this bitter triumph of Salome's lust is a little too horrible for definite and corporeal presentment. But there is no objection to the enactment of this scene in a shadow at the back of the stage. Wilde, in his stage directions, provides for absolute darkness in this scene.

The Dance

According to the dispatches from New York the principal objection raised by John Pierpont Morgan's daughter to the music drama is that it mutilates a biblical theme. From the criticisms published in the New York papers it appears that Strauss, the stage-manager and the performers have greatly intensified the fleshly features of the passionate story. There is more of lasciviousness in the music than in the drama, and to appeal to the taste of Broadway the stage manager introduced a dance which even Oscar Wilde did not contemplate. Wilde directs that Salome shall dance the dance of the seven veils which requires her to strip off seven successive coverings of her body. The Metropolitan Theatre dance was, according to the Sun, "a colorable imitation of the danse du ventre" which stirred up a commotion at the World's Fair. "Miss Froelich," says the Sun, "the dancer who for this episode represented Salome, spared the audience nothing in the matter of active and suggestive detail.

"Charley" Dickman in Trade

"Charley" Dickman, Bohemian, von vivant, artist and all round good fellow, has forsworn the brushes and canvas for the more certain emoluments of the market place. He is now over in Nevada trying to establish a line of gas plants from Goldfield to Bullfrog. As a lot of hustling, up-to-date capitalists are financing the enterprise the chances of "Charley's" success are A1. Luck, Nature and the dominant trait of the lucky gold finders to have the latest in public utilities for their camps are all on the side of the promoters. The present cold snap in the midst of the fuel famine was the finishing stroke that started every town along the Nevada mother lode to yell loudly for gas, or anything else that had heat and "Charley" Dickman answered the call. He has already started a plant in Rhyolite and is now in Goldfield signing the last papers for one in that lively camp. He was at the banquet tendered the new Goldfield Press Club a few evenings ago and made his usual happy hit. At a Bohemian jinks of that character he shines more resplendant than a gas sunburst under full pressure. By the way, the same evening Joe Jordan, an old San Francisco newspaper man, was elected President of the club.

Whirls of the Lucky Miners

Dickman and those with him are full of stories characteristic of the new mining camps. Here is one that tells of the happy-go-lucky way in which the fortune hunters take a five-minute reckless whirl with giddy Chance. "Big Tom" Reynolds happened into a well-known gambling place one evening recently. Reynolds is a well-known man about the town who is interested for the moment in anything that will give the player an opportunity to make or lose a hundred. He had had a turn of luck the night before and still thought it was with him, so he drifted over to one of the tables and produced a fistful of twenties. The deal was just beginning when he began to distribute his bets. His chips ran from one hundred to five hundred dollars at every turn. At the end of the deal, just eight minutes, he had dropped four thousand dollars. "That's fun enough for me for tonight," he said, and he walked out as unconcerned as though someone else had lost the money.

Abe and the Lunatic

The latest Abe Lincoln story comes by letter from Charley Bowers, the New York artist, to a Bohemian Club friend. It was told one night last week at a banquet of the Pleiades Club by General James Grant Wilson who said that Lincoln told it to him in Springfield, Ill., while Mr. Lincoln was carrying on the debates with Douglas. "I am one of the trustees of the State Lunatic Asylum," said Mr. Lincoln, "and one day in November I went out to make an official visit.

'Sir,' said he, 'how dare you wear your hat in the presence of General Washington.' 'All right, General,' I said; 'no offense meant. But, sir, it seems to me that a little while ago you told me you were Christopher Columbus.'

The Irrespressible Livernash

It will be regretted by some that our statesmen at Sacramento did not separate themselves from their choler before unleashing the forces of their vengeance for the chastisement of Mr. Livernash. The some to whom we refer are the benighted ones of the State who are intolerant of Mr. Livernash's activities as the flayer of a depraved government. To them it will appear that our statesmen have given renewed stimulus to the energies of the militant young publicist and have greatly enhanced his importance as a reformer. This of course was not the purpose of the statesmen. Goaded to hysterical resentment of repeated animadversions they flew into a great passion and in the fury of their wrath made of Mr. Livernash a person of such considerable consequence as to be the special object of legislative enactment. Thus they became the unconscious foils of one upon whom they expected to wreak dire vengeance, apprizing the whole State of the fact that Mr. Livernash was abusing them in the columns of the Bulletin. Men, women and children that knew nothing of the past, present or prospective future of Mr. Livernash were made cognizant of this aggressive and troublesome journalist who has been reprobating legislators for almost everything from pitch-and-toss to manslaughter. None will stop to inquire whether there was justification for his fulminations. It is generally assumed that a Legislature is at all times deserving of abuse. What sort of vengeance did the irate law-makers visit upon the head of the offensive correspondent in excluding him from their sessions? Perhaps in no other way could they have accomplished so completely and so expeditiously the consummation devoutly wished by Mr. Livernash, that of giving general publicity to his employment and zeal in the role of defender of the pee-pul's rights. If by putting their ban upon him they could have given him his quietus, then it would have been worth while to suspend the regular order of business. But merely to deny him the edificative delights of their society was a fatuous and futile expedient. Not only that; it was water on the Livernash wheel. It is the delight of Mr. Livernash to excite men to reprisal. His life has been a tempestuous one and his career has been marked by tokens of displeasure, which have afforded him much gratification. He blows across and around the country like a devastating breeze direct from the fires of the nebular chaos. But the more you know Mr. Livernash the less likely are you to take umbrage at his congenital felicities.

A Fountain of Entertainment

Whether the distinguished Mr. Livernash be mending the fences of Mr. Hearst, or grilling the people of Denver, or lambasting a Legislature for the Bulletin he inspires interest and exhales eloquence. Why dislike Mr. Livernash? Why not love him for the trouble he has made and is making and is bound to make. Furthermore, why kick against the pricks? Mr. Livernash is among the inevitable phenomena. We believe he is destined to be with us always. He has gone away many times but only to come back. He went to Congress but returned. A few short months ago he went to the people of Denver and they fired him back at us, and he was caught on the rebound by the Bulletin, which promptly claimed him on account of his potentialities along the lines which he has been pursuing in Sacramento, and also on account of his sway over the minds of the toilers. The Bulletin's wisdom in getting hold of Mr. Livernash has already been vindicated, but he has not yet extended himself, as they say on the turf. Mr. Livernash is a boundless source of inspiration to the toiling masses, and the vehicle of his homilies they will gratefully support. They prefer him to the Sermon on the Mount. In some of his impassioned assaults he may not exhibit a kindly nature, but then he does not draw a salary for addressing the sympathetic. He abounds in remonstrances and appeals only for the benefit of the toiling masses. He diffuses his imprecations for the gayety of the minions of the octopus. When his thoughts plough deeply his alabaster brow, either on his feet addressing an audience palpitating for an oracle or at the cloistered desk with burning quill in hand, he is ever, to the base, ignoble slaves of government by injunction a potent and imposing personality.

The One Touch of Nature

In excluding the Bulletin's representatives from its sacrosanct precincts the Legislature at Sacramento has proclaimed its happy concord with the sentiments of the statesmen in session in Albany, New York. That body of lawmakers has suffered the pangs of outraged dignity, too, and has vindicated itself by passing a resolution vesting the clerk with the power to exclude correspondents from the Chamber according to his own discretion. The clerk's discretion in this case is an euphemism for the will of the Raines-Grady-McCarren combination which is fighting tooth and nail against Governor Hughes' efforts to redeem his election pledges to the people of New York. The decent legislators all voted against the resolution, but there were not enough deserving that name in Albany to defeat it, so the correspondents of the New York papers exclude themselves automatically from the Legislature as soon as they dare to wire to their papers anything that questions the honorable motives of Raines or Grady or McCarren. It may be mentioned for the enlightenment of our own press muzzlers that Raines is the legislator who boasts having organized the State Senate against Governor Hughes and who was once openly charged on the floor of the Senate with taking a bribe; that Grady is the man whose elimination from politics Grover Cleveland demanded when Governor of New York; and that McCarren, besides holding Brooklyn Bridge against the repeated assaults of the Tammany tiger which comes year after year licking its chops for the fat patronage he controls, has headed the Standard Oil and gas lobbies in Albany for ten years. Far be it from our purpose to insinuate that the legislators who have gone into perpetual executive

A Night at Sanguinetti's

A reminiscence of Sanguinetti's enlivened proceedings in Judge Seawell's court a few days ago. The judge took judicial notice of the former location of the old water-front rotisserie and made it easy sailing for the voluble witness, who, in narrating her first and only experience there, drew a vivid and realistic picture of the place. She was fifty, Irish and had never had an Italian dinner. To her it was the discovery of a new world. It was after dark, the lights were blazing, the room was filled with diners, the music of banjos floated in the air, and the fog kept outside the open door. She was at one end of a long table, between two female companions; and at the other end was a larger dinner party. It is best to give her testimony in her own words: "We had finished noodles,—spaget, I think they call 'em,—the black coffee and the burnin' crame, when the waiter axed me in low tones, 'Wud we take an afther-dinner drink with a gintleman who wanted to treat the house?' So iv course I excepted f'r th' party; for his giniros'ty, seein's that there were fifty people there, was splendid, an' should-n't hev been blocked by a rayfuz'l."

"What will it be?" sez the Eyetalyan waiter.

"Crame de mint," sez somewan.

"Crame de mint," sez I, tho I'd niver heard of th' shtuff before, nor tasted it; but I didn't wish to dish-play me peculiar liken f'r whisky. Whin he came back with glasses th' size iv thimbles an' filled with something as green as park grass, I was surprised beyant speakin', but there was nothin' to do but swallow it an' thry an' think I'd had a drink. It was an apology fer wan."

"Did you dance while there?" asked the attorney.

"Sure an' I did," she answered, "but I want to explain. Ye see, Jidge, I was raised in the South, an' ivery time I hear a banjo, the chune goes to me feet. Now there was two coons pickin' a chune to beat the band, an' somewan dared me to cut a caper, an' what cud I do? There was the bare flure with its thin sawdust an' the chune in me feet! Why, if we had the same music here, an' I got the dare, I'd do some dancin' in this courtroom, sure, Jidge."

A New Industrial Center

About six miles down the bay shore the foundation of a new San Francisco suburb is in process of construction. It is to be the terminus of the Southern Pacific Company as soon as the Dumbarton bridge is built, and meanwhile it will be a scene of great industrial activity; for at this point men are now engaged in building the new freight yards which are to take the place of those in Oakland. The trains will cross the bay from Dumbarton Point to Visitacion Valley where there is a beautiful cove and here the Southern Pacific Company is reclaiming about two hundred acres of land with earth that was taken from the five tunnels of the Bay-Shore cut-off through the Mission Hills and with mud lifted by electric dredges. As soon as the new cut-off is built the yard, repair shops and round-

Japanese Soldiers in Honolulu

My Hawaiian Correspondent writes: "Secretary Taft very promptly denied the statement cabled from here that a report had been made to the War Department that there were two regiments of Japanese soldiers in Honolulu, fully officered, from Colonels down, both men and officers employed in various occupations here but ready at a moment's notice to step into their places in their regiments and obey whatever orders should be given in the name of the Emperor. His denial may be technically true. But Secretary Taft has been advised in effect of the existence of just such a military force in posse, and there is not a Federal official in the Islands who is not seeking to learn all that he can about the Japanese military in these Islands, or that is not reporting every scrap of information he can get on the subject to his superiors. The sixty-odd thousand Japanese in these Islands are animated by the military spirit, and honeycombed with military organization. Military drill is a part of the exercises of every Japanese school in Hawaii. The Japanese schoolboys have all been organized into cadet companies. It has been noticed for several months past that in some of these cadet companies there has appeared an unusual number of Japanese adults. Until recently no one thought there was any significance in this circumstance."

Some Strange Happenings

"The Chiasu Maru, a Japanese steamship," says my correspondent, "recently brought five hundred and sixty Japanese here, almost all of them declaring themselves laborers in search of labor. But not one of them has gone to work on a plantation. A very large number of them are known to be veterans of the war with Russia. They brought their army uniforms along with them in their baggage. Instead of accepting work from the planters, who offer it to every one that comes, they have refused it, and are quartered in Japanese hotels in the Oriental part of the city. What they are going to do remains to be seen. There are beginning to be indications that the Federal authorities are at work trying to head off any expressions of antipathy toward the Japanese. For instance, the present liquor law has worked so badly that both the liquor dealers and the anti-saloon element want it changed, and have in fact agreed on a number of features of a new law. Many of the worst abuses of the present law were practiced by Asiatic dealers. It was therefore proposed that licenses be issued only to citizens of the United States. The Hawaiian Medical Society some time ago decided to ask the coming Legislature to require that all examinations in medicine for license to practice in this Territory should be in the English language, a provision that prevails almost everywhere but here. Lately the word seems to have been passed that both these measures would be looked on with disapproval by the President and that if they are pressed it will be at the peril of the people of Hawaii."

Origin of Bridge

The Legislature having taken up the subject of gambling in homes mainly for the purpose of abating the bridge fever will no doubt stimulate interest in that game. It has been ever thus: efforts at suppression that are impossible of success invariably stimulate interest in the object of hostility. Hence the pretext afforded me to become the historian of bridge. For bridge has an interesting history and it is perhaps unknown to ninety-nine out of every hundred devotees of the game. Indeed most players are under a misapprehension as to its very recent history in this country, being of the opinion that it came hither from England whereas it was carried into England via the United States. The origin of bridge is somewhat shrouded in mystery. The game is said to have originated in Russia, but there is no satisfactory proof of this statement. It was first known under the title of "Biritch or Russian Whist," and this no doubt gave rise to the idea that it was of Russian origin, although as a matter of fact, the word "Biritch" is not to be found in any Russian dictionary. In the late seventies it was played in Constantinople by the Russian colony. In the sixties there was a game of whist played in Germany and Austria called "Cayenne" and it is believed that bridge, as we play it, combines certain features of cayenne and biritch.

From Paris To New York

Bridge was played in Paris in the early nineties and in April, 1892, Mr. Henry Barbey of New York returned home from the French capital very full of the new and delightful card-game which he had learned in that city. Shortly after his return he gave a dinner-party at his own house, with the special object of introducing the new game to his friends, but the experiment was not much of a success. His guests did not appear to be at all enraptured with the novelty, saying that the scoring was too difficult and the game altogether too complicated, and one or two of them left early and broke up the party. Mr. Barbey, in no way disheartened, consulted with Mr. H. de Forrest Weekes, whom he had converted to his own way of thinking, as to what was to be done next. They agreed that the wrong sort of men had been present at the first trial, and a second dinner was given to a carefully selected few, who were all enthusiastic card-players, and this time the result was very different. In the meantime Mr. Barbey had drawn up on a sheet of paper a short precis of the method of scoring, and of the principal points of the game. He adopted the somewhat novel method of cutting out pips from a pack of ordinary playing-cards and pasting them on the aforesaid sheet of paper, to indicate the different suits. This original document is now framed, and hanging in the card-room of the Whist Club of New York. After the second dinner party Mr. Weekes had copies of this document printed and sent them round to all the leading clubs in New York. From this time the game took on like wild-fire, and it has never hung since; still, it did not have quite the same meteoric success in New York that it had in London, and whist did not die the same sudden and unexpected death in America that it did in England.

Bibliography of Bridge

It was not until 1894 that the game was played in England. It was introduced by some Americans who have the entree to the Portland Club of London, a sanctum that had long been sacred to the cult of whist.

The Americans expressed surprise to find the members playing whist, and told them they were quite behind the times. When the charms and mysteries of bridge were explained to a few members and the game was given a fair chance whist was routed root and branch. When bridge was once fairly established in England, the necessity arose for a recognized and authorized code of laws for the new game, and it was drawn by a committee of three members of the Portland Club. Shortly thereafter came a perfect flood of bridge literature. The bibliography of bridge would make a large library. There never was a game about which so many people have aired their different opinions, and hardly a week passes without some fresh aspirant to literary fame setting forth his views under an alluring title.

Caswell Becomes a Tea Expert

The United States Treasury Department has honored San Francisco in the appointment of two prominent merchants instead of one as formerly to represent the Pacific Coast on the United States Board of Tea Experts. The two are Mr. Chas. D. Platt of J. A. Folger & Co. and Mr. Geo. W. Caswell of the Geo. W. Caswell Co. There have been heretofore but seven members on the board and New York City was the only one having two representatives. In the appointment of Mr. Geo. W. Caswell, San Francisco therefore, is placed on an equal footing with New York. It was considered necessary to appoint two members from San Francisco, on account of the increasing importation of Teas. The Board of Tea Experts will meet at New York City at the office of the Appraiser of Merchandise, Feb. 11, 1907, and standards for the new

THE AUTOMOBILE SHOW

An Exhibition That Will Be Educational and of General Interest

By Homer Boushey

(Chairman Show Committee)

That the Automobile Show to be held at the Coliseum near the Park Panhandle, from February 18th to the 25th, will be of interest to every motor enthusiast is a foregone conclusion. He will be eager to scrutinize the 1907 models and see how they compare with those of 1906. He will go to the show as an expert critic in quest of practical information. But how about the man who is not so fortunate as to own a machine? Will he find anything to interest him? We can only judge from the experience of people in those eastern cities where similar shows have recently been held. Reports from those cities are to the effect that the exhibitions proved of absorbing interest to the general public not only because of the magnificence and splendor of the display, but for the reason that intelligent people in every community wish to keep abreast of the times. Even non-motorists wish to be informed respecting the latest devices and the progress that is being made in a great industry. That such will prove to be the case in this city it is safe to predict. For what man is there in these bustling days who, if he does not own an automobile, does not hope to own one?

Twelve years ago the automobile was as strange a sight in America as an air-ship is today. What a change! One needs to stand on Van Ness avenue only five minutes to see at least twenty or thirty machines go shooting up or down the thoroughfare. In 1895 there was not an automobile factory in the United States. What machines we had were of foreign manufacture. Yet during the year ending June 30, 1905, the exports alone of American cars amounted to $2,481,243. During the year 1906 there were manufactured in the United States about thirty thousand machines which were sold to the public at an average of $2,000 per car, making a total valuation of $60,000,000. It is estimated that there are in use today fully 150,000 automobiles of all kinds in the United States. With an average of four persons to a car there is over a half million people speeding over the country every day in the year.

The automobile industry is showing a greater increase than most any other line of manufacture. The automobile has come to stay. At first it was looked on as a fad—a millionaire's toy. Not so now. The automobile has proved its practicability and no one is more cognizant of this fact than the San Franciscan who saw its operations on those trying April days of almost a year ago.

One thing that is responsible for the interest taken now in autos is the standardization of construction. The auto is past the experimental stage. Manufacturers have quit producing freak models and have settled down to manufacture the models that the test of time has proved the most practical. The buyer feels safe in buying now. He knows that the machine he buys this year is not going to be a "back number" next season.

This is to be San Francisco's first automobile show and first exposition of any kind since the fire. That the exhibition will be a great success is certainly assured. If only motorists were to attend, the show would be well patronized. Only when one starts to figuring does he find that there is in San Francisco one automobile to every 133 people. In this respect we are ahead of Chicago where there is one auto to every 377 people. The State of New York has one machine to every 210 people, while California has one motorear to every 173 people. Taking the entire United States there is one car to every 566 people. The man without an auto who ponders these figures will probably feel that he is out of the running.

And now as to the character of the coming show: It will comprise several hundred machines representing fully one hundred different makes. Each and every one will be the newest 1907 model. The enterprise of the Automobile Dealers' Association is shown by the fact that they are bringing to the show an entire train load of machines direct from the New York Show which closed last Saturday night in Madison Square Garden. This train leaves Chicago February 1st running on almost passenger time. It will reach San Francisco no later than the 7th or 8th, fully ten days before the opening of the show.

The Coliseum has a floor space of 120,000 square feet all of which has been taken by the respective dealers, both in machines, devices and accessories. The exhibits will have a valuation of fully one-half million dollars. The great building is being decorated with myriads of incandescent lights set in clusters and draped with colored bunting. The dazzling reflections of the thousands of lights in the highly-polished and enameled parts of the machines conveys a picture that can only be appreciated when seen in its beautiful reality.

Exploiting the Winships

The startling story comes from New York that we are to lose the Emory Winships. The story appeared recently in the columns of a New York paper, but seemed to have for its foundation nothing more substantial than the circumstance that Lieutenant Winship and his wife were at the Hotel Netherland. Mrs. Winship, said the writer, was living at that hotel "pending the time when she can domicile herself in an establishment suited to the campaign she intends to wage, which establishment she is now intent on finding." And then the writer proceeded to serve up all the epochal episodes of Mrs. Winship's career exhibiting a familiarity with details that could not in his affections. He has been very attentive to the youngest of a large family of girls and has shown more than passing interest in a young lady whose sister announced her engagement a short time ago. Probably he is steering a platonic course in both cases but Mrs. Grundy wears a "show me" expression whenever the subject is mentioned. Mr. Stetson is one of the few good "catches" among those bachelors who are not looked upon by match-making mammas as hopelessly irretrievable. Hence the curiosity and the simplicity of the circumstance by which it is excited. Perhaps Mr. Stetson feels that a man has a right to be gallant without being suspected of treason to bachelordom. However, should his engagement be announced there would be many friends to offer felicitations.

Miss Mae Slessinger

One of the most popular young women of the Jewish community is Miss Mae Slessinger, a particularly talented painter of miniatures who is now on her way abroad to complete her studies under the direction of some notable masters in Paris. Miss Slessinger holds to her credit some very fine portraits of well-known San Franciscans and she is sure to make an enviable name for herself before many years have past.

have been acquired except during a long residence in this city, and treating them in a manner characteristic of the envious and malevolent female of the species.

He Has Them Guessing

As a rule it is the dear girls who make Mrs. Grundy sit tight on the guessing stool but this season there are several chaps whose cardiac intentions have not been properly pigeonholed and unless they declare themselves soon they will be tagged as flirtatious little manlets. Harry Stetson will never come under that category but nevertheless society is wondering which of two attractive young girls has made a serious dent

No Bridge in the Wet

Mrs. Carolan and the weather man had a tiff last Saturday night and as a result the al fresco bridge party suffered a damp demise. Mrs. Carolan loves novelty and to play bridge under the stars suited her fancy but when the heavens sprang a leak there was no alternative but to play indoors and the badge of expectancy which society always wears at a Carolan function did not serve as a talisman. Mrs. Carolan has set a standard for herself which out-Harries in a refined way anything Lehr ever attempted at Newport and when she gives a merely smart function without the superadded thrill of novelty society feels a pang of disappointment. No one who had the good fortune to be present has yet forgotten the function at which Mrs. Carolan was assisted in receiving her guests by six gorgeously gowned women whom no one had ever seen before. Upon closer inspection these elegant ladies proved to be wax figures that Mrs. Carolan had ordered made for the occasion. So life-like were they that every newcomer made her best bow before she realized that the wax works were literally a jolly. A cynic might have detected a decadent note in the laughter that punctuated the edifying conversations which the wags and wits held with the wax figures but it served to tickle the funny bone of society. The affair was never bavaarded in the press but society still rocks with mirth at the recollection of this unique "stunt."

Her Pursuit of Mahogany

No historian has yet revealed whether the Round Table at which King Arthur's Knights sat was a mahogany board, but certain it is that never a knight essayed a more daring quest than Mrs. Frank Powers's venturesome pursuit into the very courts of law for a mahogany table which her soul coveted. According to published report the woman who owns the table agreed to sell it to Mrs. Powers and at the psychological moment exercised her feminine prerogative and changed her mind. Whereupon Mrs. Powers, backed by the legal advice of her husband, went to court to discover whether the woman's mental somersaults were according to Blackstone. The case is under advisement, and in the meantime Mrs. Powers sits midst her Chippendale, Shearer, Hepplewhite and Sheraton and sighs for the mahogany table which is not. To the born collector everything in life is merely incidental to gratifying a passion for a bit of china or a piece of mahogany.

Mrs. Voorhies' Collection

Mrs. Powers has some very fine specimens of early woodcraft and so has Mrs. J. Mora Moss, whose interesting collection fortunately escaped the flames. But perhaps the most valuable pieces of mahogany in San Francisco are owned by Mrs. Alfred Hunter Voorhies. Her collection of high boys and tables and chairs is not the result of arduous poking about in secondhand corners. The pieces have been handed down in her family. The chairs in the Voorhies dining-room once graced Lord Baltimore's manor house. The table upon which the treaty of Ghent was signed is the prize possession in the Voorhies family. Mrs. Voorhies has never sought to add to her collection by buying pieces of furniture which are not grained with memories of her ancestors. So she is not listed among the "collectors."

End of Love's Young Dream

The intimate friends of Powers Gouraud, who is getting a divorce from the daughter of Amy Crocker Gouraud, are very confident that he is going to get a very substantial sum of money when the decree is granted. Some say it will be $200,000. He is living in very swell apartments at the Sioux Falls hotel where he is stopping pending the end of the suit. He spends money lavishly, never hesitating about the cost of anything and brags that when the case is over he will buy one of the biggest cattle ranches in that part of the country. His brother is still living quietly with the mother of his wife, Amy Crocker-Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud. No cloud has risen yet to darken their domestic horizon. Miss Crocker was but seventeen years old when she married young Gouraud, a boy of twenty. That was three years ago.

Society's Interest In Pottery

Several society girls are earnestly considering a scheme to establish a pottery here. Their plans are still glazed with secrecy but if the promised co-operation of a wealthy patron of the arts materializes we shall some day have limoges faience of our own instead of patronizing the Rookwood potteries. There are a number of artistic young women here who would take a delight in pottery. Girls like Cora Smedberg, Helen Ashton, and Miss Collier who excel in book-binding would no doubt take kindly to kiln work. Apropos of the famous Rookwood pottery very few people know that it was Mrs. Bellamy Storer who established the first pottery for porcelain decorations and overglaze in Cincinnati. As far back as 1880 Mrs. Storer crystallized her interest in artistic ceramics into a pottery which she called Rookwood after her magnificent home. Her genius for that sort of thing sandwiched between two thick slices of inherited wealth soon made the Rookwood ware famous the world around. Some of the choicest pieces of pottery ever displayed at Tiffanys were designed and fired by Mrs. Bellamy Storer. For eight years this remarkable woman personally ran the Rookwood potteries and then sold it out to the present operators. But even her later-day genius for politics has not crowded out an absorbing interest in the pottery that made Cincinnati famous.

Her Maid, Her Doctor and a Clergyman

Mrs. Charles H. Farnum of New York, a wealthy and prominent woman, was one of the most notable arrivals at the Hotel Green in Pasadena last week. Mrs. Farnum brought with her her private physician, Dr. S. R. Williams, a trained nurse and maid; and a clergyman, Rev. Edward Morgan, of New York, was also of the party. Mrs. Farnum occupies the finest suite in the hotel and has come for the remainder of the winter.

Gossip From Los Angeles

My Los Angeles correspondent writes: General and Mrs. Elwell S. Otis with their young daughter, Miss Louise Otis, are among prominent army folks who are spending the winter in Los Angeles, and in honor of their visit the principal hostesses of the South have been entertaining on an elaborate scale during the last few weeks. Announcement was made last week of the engagement of Miss Jessie Gilmore, daughter of the Collins Gilmores of San Diego, to Bryant Matthews, a brother of the well-known Southern California writer of short stories, Amanda Matthews. The promoters of the Assembly dances which were arranged as a series of entertainments for the very exclusive members of the younger set decided upon a bal poudre to vary the programme for last week. Both belles and beaux attended in powdered wigs and patches and the novelty was thoroughly enjoyed by an unusually large gathering. The most prominent patronesses and chaperons were conspicuous by their presence in unusually handsome gowns. Society is finding the approaching wedding of Miss Louise McFarland and Leo Chandler the principal topic of pleasant gossip these days. The marriage is scheduled to take place February 6th and the ultra smart set will fill the Woman's Club House to the doors on this evening. Mr. Chandler is a brother of Jefferson P. Chandler who married the daughter of Attorney Shankland a few seasons ago, and the bride represents one of the important families of the Southwest. In the bridal suite will be Mrs. Sam Haskins, Mrs. E. A. McCarthy, Mrs. J. P. Chandler, Misses Louise Burke, Lucille Chandler, Florence Silent, Grace Mellus, Frances Cochran and a number of young men whose frequent service as ushers renders their presence valuable at fashionable affairs where there is a crush. The coming nuptials have furnished the motive of the principal teas, dinners, theatre parties and luncheons of the month.

Gossip From Del Monte

My Monterey correspondent writes: Under the oaks of Del Monte on Wednesday evening the climax to a pretty little romance was enacted. Nearly a fortnight ago among the guests of this big Monterey Hotel were Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Merriman and Miss Merriman of Exeter, Cal., and Carl D. Greene, from Chicago. They said they expected a party of friends to arrive about the last of the month, and aside from making arrangements for them they requested that the pretty little Del Monte Chapel be lighted and decorated on the night of January thirtieth, and that one of the private dining-rooms be made to look its prettiest with palms and blossoms, and that amongst the greens should be concealed a stringed orchestra. It was rumored that the Merrimans and Mr. Greene were acting in behalf of friends who were coming across the Continent in order to have a ceremony performed in the spot they had heard was the most romantic in California. Now it appears that the happy man is no other than Mr. Greene himself. The young lady in the case is Miss Amy Merriman of Marinette, Wisconsin. Sunday night there arrived at Del Monte a private car which had come from Exeter to Tracy, thence to San Jose and on to Del Monte. Beside the prospective bride and groom were Mrs. A. C. Merriman, Mrs. R. W. Merriman and A. C. Merriman Jr., of Marinette; Mr. and Mrs. Olmstead, from Los Angeles; Mr. and Mrs. John A. Van Cleve, Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Merriman and Miss Merriman of Exeter, and Mr. and Mrs. O. C. Harlowe of Green Bay, Wisconsin. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Rev. G. M. Cutting of St. Mary's-by-the Sea.

Mrs. Clapham and Miss Clapham of Victoria, British Columbia, left Del Monte a few days ago for the South. For many years Miss Clapham and her mother, who, by the way, greatly resembles the late Queen Victoria, have spent a part of each winter at Del Monte.

Miss Ella Morgan still stays on with her friends. Mrs. Low and Miss Flora Low. Last week she gave a delightful little dinner in the grill room to Mrs. H. Schmeidel, Mrs. Low and Miss Low, and although only four sat down to the beautifully decorated table the menu was as elaborate as if the guests had been a score. A few days later Miss Morgan gave a luncheon in one of the private dining-rooms in honor of Mrs. Charles H. Poor of Washington, D. C., who is visiting her daughter, Mrs. Maus, whose husband is the Commanding Officer of the Monterey Presidio. Besides Mrs. Poor and Mrs. Maus, Miss Morgan's guests were Mrs. Trilley, wife of Rear Admiral Joseph Trilley, Mrs. Captain Adams, Mrs. Low, Miss Low and Mrs. Frisch. The luncheon was served on the Low family silver, long stored, but unpacked for this occasion. Could sparkling silver speak, what tales it could tell of brilliant speeches made by notables gathered around the Governor's hospitable table. Frederic Nicholls of Toronto, with his golden haired young daughter, will be here for some little time. Miss Hazel is a fine little horsewoman, and spends many hours each day in the saddle.

Lieutenant Colonel George M. Dunn, with his wife and son, will remain several weeks at Del Monte. The golf links are for them the greatest attraction.

The Tale of a Theft

The friends of Mrs. William Sexton are much amused at her experience while out shopping on a recent rainy day. While in a fashionable dressmaking shop on Van Ness avenue she forgot her umbrella, a very expensive one of unique design with a small watch in the handle. She prizes it very much and she was consequently greatly agitated when, after leaving the shop, she remembered that she had left the umbrella behind. Hastening back to the shop she looked for the umbrella and to her dismay it was gone. The news of her loss caused quite a commotion in the shop, but not greater than that which disturbed the mind of Mrs. Sexton. As the umbrella could not be found the supposition was that a kleptomaniac had been in the shop and this supposition proved quite accurate; for a little later Mrs. Sexton saw a fashionable dressed woman walking along Van Ness avenue with the ferrule-end of an umbrella exposed to view and the handle concealed beneath her sealskin coat. It was the stolen umbrella. In the silk cover just above the ferrule pink flowers had been worked and with these exposed to view it was unnecessary for Mrs. Sexton to see the handle. She recognized her umbrella and seized the ferrule. The lady in the sealskin protested, but Mrs. Sexton claimed her property and looked for a policeman. The lady yielded up the umbrella and fled. It is said that she is a wealthy Easterner who has been living at one of our fashionable temporary hotels.

Last Saturday night Mr. Charles F. Hanlon gave a very enjoyable dinner at The Severn for Mr. John Huff. The guests numbered twenty-four. Among them were Count Yashi Lithoff, George Whittell, Dr. Alexander Garceau, Henry W. Taylor and Dr. Charles E. Parent.

Dr. and Mrs. L. D. Mead returned Wednesday from a two months sojourn in Tahiti. Dr. Mead will resume his position as medical director at Byron Hot Springs.

The Music of Salome

"Salome," the one-act music drama, against which a protest has been raised in New York was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House last Wednesday night. Of the music the Sun's critic said: "The writing for the voices contains not a single point of vocal display. For the singer, using that term in its strict sense as it is used in reference to the voice parts of Mozart, Gluck or Wagner, there is extremely little. The text is treated conversationally throughout, and the declamation goes further away from anything which we have hitherto recognized as singing than even the wildest passages in this same composer's songs. In some speeches it produces the illusion of spoken text. One has to listen keenly to perceive that the tones are sung. Yet these passages are among the most wonderfully expressive in the drama. The orchestral portion is one continuous piece of symphonic tone painting. Leading themes are employed as they are in the Wagner drama. But the writing for the orchestra is planned on a larger and more complicated scale. Gluck, for instance, aimed at a grand simplicity. Strauss aims at the effects of an imposing complexity. He is the Turner of tone painters. He uses the most bizarre palette, and sometimes things are out of drawing; but he fills his canvas with weird, distorted atmosphere, with vast expanses of contrasting color and figure and with an infinite number of details which only gradually shape themselves into a concrete whole. No one can hear half of them at a first performance. Thousands will say that this music is ultra-Wagnerian. The truth is that Strauss begins where Wagner left off. Wagner is his point of departure."

The Drama

Of the drama the same critic wrote: The drama concerns itself with the shocking emotions of "Salome" and the shattered, perverted and decaying personality of "Herod." It is a study in rottenness. Ibsen in his most merciless exposures of decadent humanity never created a more amazing character study than this "Herod." Strauss's music has done wonders for the Wilde original. The recitative style is the very speech of the man. The orchestral illustrations of his blasted and putrid soul are marvelous in their scarifying truthfulness. When he is haunted by fancies of great winds, of alternate heat and cold, the orchestra paints in tone pictures of wonderful fidelity. A nerve shattered, dream haunted wreck, vainly seeking forgetfulness in drink, is the master creation of Mr. Strauss, realist. On the other hand the orchestra sweats and stews and quivers madly with the abandon of "Salome's" physical passion for the prophet. Mere words and cold type cannot convey to the reader any realization of the manner in which this man Strauss rips the covering off a soul beside which that of Swinburne's Faustine is as a lily beside a poppy. In his musical delineation of "Herod" and "Salome" the composer has made music publish the monstrosities of minds and bodies diseased, and he has done it with a power little short of diabolical. As an expression of the horrible fancies of Oscar Wilde this score is a masterpiece. As a demonstration of the suitability of ultra modern composition to the purposes of the music drama it is complete and convincing.

Travers "Arrives"

News comes from Chicago of the success on the stage of Reginald Travers of this city who was identified in a minor capacity with the Frawley and Neil companies and who was playing at the Majestic Theatre in this city at the time of the fire. He has made a big hit in Chicago in Hauptmann's "Elga," with Crystal Herne, daughter of James Herne.

Greenbaum's Coming Treats

Manager Will Greenbaum has succeeded in arranging the dates for the Rosenthal concerts. The great pianist will appear at Christian Science Hall Thursday evening, February 28, and he will give a Saturday matinee on March 2. It is also likely that he will give a concert on the afternoon of Sunday, March 3. On Friday afternoon, March 1, he will appear at the Greek Theatre with the University orchestra, on which occasion will be played the Chopin E minor and Saint Saens A flat major concertos. As it has been many years since our music lovers have had an opportunity to hear a pianist play the great concertos with orchestral accompaniment, there will no doubt be a large attendance at the Greek Theatre performance. Tickets for the Greek Theatre will be sold at the regular box offices of Manager Greenbaum. Our enterprising impresario, by the way, has another big treat in store for music lovers. He is going to bring to town the San Carlo Opera Company from the French Opera House of New Orleans. This company consists of 165 persons and numbers among its principals Alice Nielsen, Lillian Nordica, Companari, the baritone, and Constantin, a high priced tenor who is ranked in Europe with Caruso and Bonci. There is an orchestra of forty-five pieces with this company, a chorus of fifty and a ballet of twenty-four.

The Perennial Thomas Play

"Alabama," the most successful drama that Augustus Thomas ever wrote is announced as the next attraction at the Colonial Theatre. "Alabama" is a delightful and entertaining drama dealing with life in the South during the war time and abounding in sentimental interest. The plot hinges on the estrangement of father and son, the former being an ardent adherent of the Confederacy while the son throws his lot with the North. After a lapse of eighteen years the son returns as Captain Davenport and proposes to build a railroad across his father's land, to which plan the old gentleman strenuously objects. "Alabama" has proven one of the best stock plays on the American stage and in the hands of the capable players composing the Colonial Theatre Stock Company should be presented in a most convincing manner.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The programme at the Orpheum next week beginning Sunday matinee will be a novel and attractive one. Patrice, a dainty and piquante comedienne, will make her reappearance after a long absence and present a little sketch of Western life entitled "Gloria." She will be supported by her own company, which includes

All the luxuries of New York and Paris at The Severn, 1050 Geary street, east of Van Ness.

Charles Hutchison, an actor with an Eastern reputation. Hickey and Nelson, clever entertainers, will introduce a mirthful musical skit called "Twisted and Tangled." Happy Jack Gardner, alias "The Man With the Horn," a capital monologist and singing comedian, is another of the newcomers. "Little Hip," the smallest performing elephant in the world, should prove a fascinating novelty. Madox and Melvin, "The Labakins," and their wonderful dog "Folly," Chris Smith and the two Johnsons, New Orpheum Motion Pictures and Alfred Keley and Company will conclude a delightful entertainment. Mr. Keley will present will be readily recognized as the fun loving mischief making Buster. His dog Tige is of course still prominent in all the trouble. Master Percy Helton is now the Buster of the cast. He is the youngest of the actors thus far seen in the role, and it is said that he cleverly simulates the vim and spirit of a real boy having a really good time. He has an excellent singing voice, dances gracefully and is a comedian to his finger tips. The company numbers forty and includes a handsome chorus. Seats for the production of "Buster Brown" are now on sale at the box office of the Novelty Theatre. A popular scale of prices will prevail.

Buster and Tige

"Buster Brown" will be the attraction at the Novelty Theatre for eight nights and three matinees commencing Sunday afternoon, February 3. This season's production of the musical comedy is said to be even superior to the one that won a big success here last season. Buster comes this time in an entirely new dress, not so greatly changed, however, but that he

"Princess Chic" Next

The new American Theatre is already intrenched in public favor. Not only has the opening attraction received substantial endorsement but the house itself has been the object of enthusiastic encomiums. During the week the old Tivoli favorites have received gratifying testimony of the esteem in which they are held, and at several of the performances society was well represented in box and theatre parties. "The Strollers" will continue as the attraction until Monday city. The music is by Herbert and is therefore catchy. The leading comedy role is an old favorite of Hartman's, one of the many in which he more than made good. There is abundant opportunity for the chorus which, with the orchestra, Paul Steindorff has well in hand. There is always good music at Idora, and as there is good skating too, not to speak of good singing and a lot of pretty girls, the park and its opera house constitute a very attractive resort. The management intends to put on that other Herbert favorite, "The Serenade," to follow "The Wizard."

"The Virginian" follows "Buster Brown" at the Novelty. Dustan Farnum will have the title role and Frank Cameau will again be seen as Trampas.

In the Limelight

Naho Frank, well remembered by opera-goers, has lost his job as first violin with the Metropolitan Orchestra. He had to resign on account of the ill will of the musicians.

Henry W. Savage's leading comic opera star, Raymond Hitchcock and the immensely successful production of "The Galloper" will be seen here in the near future. This will be San Francisco's first opportunity since the fire to see a real big comic opera production. Hitchcock in "King Dodo" and "The Yankee Consul" gave to American theatre-goers two of the best performances of late years.

Creston Clarke will be an early attraction here.

Jessie Izett in "Susan in Search of a Husband" gives a star performance; in fact, the entire cast smacks of steller interpretations.

Nance O'Neil will be seen here before long in "The Sorceress."

Cecil Cowles' Recital

One of the greatest musical artists California has produced is Cecil Cowles who, in spite of her extreme youth, is quite well known. On Thursday, February 7, Cecil will give the public an opportunity to witness the extent to which her really marvelous gifts have been developed. Even as a nine-year-old pianist and composer she aroused the greatest admiration, and her advancement has been of unparalleled rapidity. Cecil has the faculty of absolute pitch, improvises beautifully and composes well enough to win the admiration of Pietro Mascagni during his visit to San Francisco some three years ago. She is a pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt, whose vast experience with musical talent of every degree makes his enthusiasm over this little girl of particular significance. At the forthcoming concert Cecil's programme will be: I—(a) prelude, F sharp, op. 12, No. 13; (b) prelude, C sharp minor, op. 12, No. 10; (c) prelude, A major, op. 12, No. 7; (d) prelude, B flat minor, op. 12, No. 16. Chopin. II—(a) Aufschwung, op. 12, No. 2; (b) Warum? op. 12, No. 3, Schumann; (c) waltz, E minor posthumous, Chopin. III—(a) Etude, F minor, op. 25, No. 2; (b) Rondo brillante, E flat, Chopin. IV—(a) Vogel als Prophet, op. 82, No. 7, Schumann; (b) Fuge, G minor, op. 5, No. 3, Rheinberger; (c) Valse de Concert, op. 34, Moszkowski. By Sydney Olivier

Out of the bottomless Ocean rift,

The dumb, dead glooms and slimes of it,
The sunlight beckons the aimless drift.And the moon bespeaks the times of it:
And the stormwind saws at the thundering strings,

Till the breakers bellow the chimes of it—

The close-wrought song that the Ocean sings,

With racing ripples the rhymes of it.

Out of the flaming firmament,

The ringing, singing mint of them,

The scarlet fades and the stars are spent,

One after one the glint of them:

And clear glow here the patterned words,

And dim is there the hint of them.

The hieroglyphs of beasts and birds,

For God to read the print of them.

Out of the wonder of Death and of Life,

Whatever stings or stirs of it,

Splendour of loving, splendour of strife,

The steadfast or perverse of it,—

The blessing or the curse of it,—

The better or the worse of it,—

There is no Word that is spoken to Man,

But Man shall make his Verse of it.

Letters

Meyer's "Nine Swords of Morales"

Some wiseacre has recently been killing space in a lengthy screed in which he has attempted to prove that there never was a romantic period in the history of California when caballeros were brave and senoras beautiful; when haciendas were spacious and hospitality unbounded; in fact and in short, that the early Californians were about on a par with the Digger Indians, ignorant, idle and unregenerate. Perhaps he is right, but that would prove but a poor excuse for refusing to be entertained by a good story even though there is no basis of historical fact underlying it. As well refuse to read Shakespeare because we know the good Queen Bess ate with her fingers, swore like a trooper, and boxed the ears of her courtiers. Perhaps there never were any Morales at all, nor a Pancha Rivas, whose coquetry involved the whole Sonoma Valley in a feud, but if not, at all events George Homer Meyer has done some excellent pretending. His book is not new, as things go in the book world today, having made its appearance early last spring, but local events of considerable importance to San Franciscans crowded it into the background then, and it is but justice to the author that interest should be revived now that our lives have fallen upon quieter times. "The Nine Swords of Morales" were the nine stalwart sons of one of the early California dons. Their father had early instructed them in swordsmanship, and it goes without saying that in a country without roads and without wheeled conveyances of any kind they were equally expert horsemen. They lived after the manner of their kind, in rough comfort, their herds roaming the unfenced plains, and their followers soldiers or servants, as circumstances demanded. Pancha Rivas was the fickle goddess whose demands and exactions played havoc with the hearts of her wooers. It was her whim to send a belated message to one lover, demanding his presence by a given time, or the forfeiture of her hand, and it was the determination of Gonzales, that he would load the dice and prevent the fulfillment of de Guerra's journey which involved him in a quarrel in which the Nine Swords enlisted themselves with their friend and guest, de Guerra. It was, on the whole, a bloodless warfare, considering the times and the nettle of the men, but it is not to be understood from this that there was any lack of excitement. Cattle were raided in a style that would have done credit to the "lifting" caterans of the Scottish border, and there was an abundance of hard riding, much fighting, daring reconnaissances, invasions of each other's territory, and even kidnappings, and escapes hair-breadth enough to suit the most exacting. Such historic names as Vallejo, Carillo, Pacheco, Berryessa and Rivas are to be found in every chapter, and that mysterious old chief, Sonoma, plays his part. Mr. Meyer has cleverly interwoven some of the legends of the early days, now all but forgotten, and has spared us the trite descriptions which make up the stock in trade of most writers who attempt to delineate the life of the early part of the last century. In spite of the lawlessness, if we may use the term in connection with a period when there was no law, the adventurous spirit of the ease with which the factions found followers, "The Nine Swords of Morales" cannot be classed with blood-and-thunder fiction. On the whole, the episode was much after the fashion of a cowboy "shooting up," more an effervescence of spirits, and a demonstration of loyal friendship than an indication of ill feeling. There was no real grievance, except against Ramon Gonzales, and that not for his winning of the fair Pancha, but for his attempt to interfere with his rival's journey. And after the only sister of the Gonzales eloped with a Morales, and the remaining daughter of Don Pedro Rivas was claimed by Herrera, who had assumed the place of the disabled de Guerra, the leaders were so entangled in criss-cross family alliances that, when the invitations for the marriage of de Guerra and Dolores Morales were announced, and the Comandante and all his relatives, who had held aloof from the disturbance, announced their intention of being present, there was a general shaking of hands and as much enthusiasm about repairing mischief as there had been before in inflicting it. Except for those who are predetermined to find nothing good "before the Gringos came," "The Nine Swords of Morales" will make excellent reading. It does not fly in the face of accepted traditions, and probably gives as fair a picture of early days as any historical novel does of the time it attempts to depict. It is a stirring romance, abounding in life and color and will appeal to all lovers of the romantic atmosphere of early California. Published by H. Altenus.

Authors and Their Names

Robert Hichens has a middle name, "Smythe," of which he makes no use. Anthony Hope is in private life Mr. Hawkins. Josiah Flynt uses but two-thirds of his name and Joseph Conrad has dropped his unwieldy Polish patronymic of Korzeniowski. Hall Caine's full name is Thomas Henry Hall Caine. Gellett Burgess used to prefix "Frank," as did Bailey Millard. Kipling's baptismal name is John Rudyard Kipling. Authors nowadays, as a rule, drop part of their names simply as a matter of convenience, but there was a time when writing was not considered as altogether a creditable performance, especially for women, and an effort was made to either keep the matter secret or else to protect the family from the disgrace, on the same principle that stage folk concealed their identity. Occasionally a pen name becomes better known than the real one, as in the case of Mark Twain. Henry Harland began his literary career by writing stories of Jewish life, and his signature Sydney Luska, taken in connection with the character of his work, gave the impression which he probably intended to create, that he was a young Hebrew of orthodox adherence. Grant Allen used several names for different classes of writing, and it was not until after his death that the identity, and even the sex of the author of some of his novels was determined. Henry Seton Merriman was the name under which the late Hugh Stowell Scott published all his work, the singular reason for the concealment being that his father, who was editor of one of the London weeklies, tried to dissuade him from attempting a literary career because he so evidently lacked the requisite ability. The elder Scott never knew of his son's success. It is told of him that once, after reading a novel which especially pleased him, he turned to Hugh, and commending the book, said, "If you could do something like that, now, it would be worth while," but even then the veil was not lifted, though the story which excited his enthusiasm was by "Henry Seton Merriman." It seems a futile and foolish device to adopt a pen name, or to attempt to hide identity in anonymity, and then, after the lapse of a few weeks, to step forth into the limelight.

An Architectural Masterpiece

The New Reinforced Concrete Hotel In Pasadena of the Mission Type

The Hotel Wentworth, construction of which has just been finished on Oak Knoll, Pasadena, will be a stupendous and handsome structure, remarkable in many ways. An adequate conception of its beauty and magnitude may be gained from the accompanying illustration.

The building is situated on the brow of a hill overlooking the San Gabriel Valley, with a magnificent vista to the Sierra Madre Mountains. The snow-capped peaks of Old Baldy and Mt. Wilson are plainly visible, and form a pleasing contrast to the sun-kissed slopes of the valley, with its orchards and verdant orange groves.

The grounds of the hotel contain a great variety of shade trees, among them some of the finest old oaks in the vicinity. The lines of the building have been made to conform with those of nature and none of the forest leviathans have been sacrificed to make room for the walls.

An army of workmen, more than 800 in number, has been employed for the past seven months on the work.

It is constructed throughout of reinforced concrete. Walls, floors, partitions and roofs are built of this material. This form of construction makes it possible to finish and decorate the rooms in the lower stories before the upper stories are built. No hotel in the world will be run more nearly fireproof than this.

The architecture is of the mission type, carried out with a purity of style and with the careful and conscientious attention to detail which the architect for this building has developed in some of the other large hotels of the West, of which the Alvarado, at Albuquerque, N. M., the Cardenas at Trinidad, and El Tovar at Grand Canon are examples.

All ostentation and appearance of commercialism have been avoided, while the interior decorations are as rich and elegant as wealth can provide and good taste dictate. The purpose of the designer is to express the repose and homelike feeling so essential to the success of a resort hotel.

The main building, across the front, will be six stories in height; in the center a massive tower, fifty feet square, surmounted by four square turrets will rise to a height of nine stories. On the highest floor to which the elevator runs, there will be one of the original features of the building, a climatorium with a roof garden above.

Two of the turrets will contain the water tanks which will supply the hotel with water, the third will contain the private "den" of General Wentworth, and the fourth will house a beautiful chime of bells whose soft, melodious notes will be heard over the valley in the soft twilight of the evening.

From each end of the main building a four-story wing extends obliquely from the front corners, each surmounted by a roof garden and a promenade. The ends of the wings are carried up into towers one story higher. The result of this arrangement is a large number of corner suites with commanding views of the valley and the mountains. The entire roof of the hotel will be covered with red tile of the mission pattern. The buildings to the rear, which are grouped about the large, quadrangular patio, are of broken outline, lending a picturesque charm to the entire group. Viewed from any point the great pile will present a castled effect suggestive of a citadel or an old Spanish hacienda on a large scale. The autobusses from the railroad station will enter the grounds by a broad avenue, winding under eucalyptus trees, through an archway, and, swinging around the fountain in the patio, will deliver the loads of guests at the hotel portal.

At the outer entrance to the patio the guests will be struck with the fact that within it are several monarchs of the forest dating back to the time of the padres. In order that the illusion may be more faithfully carried out, the roughest surface of the concrete walls of the building will be stained a weather-beaten color to give it the appearance of great age.

To the right of the patio is the dining-room with high, vaulted ceiling, capable of seating 600 guests. Through the arcaded sides of this room one catches glimpses of the coffee and breakfast rooms, which flank it, while grouped about it are private dining-rooms, banquet room, children's dining-room and buffet, all served from the same kitchen. To the rear of the main dining-room is the great serving-room, the ceiling of which is of such height as to admit of windows overlooking the roofs of the adjoining buildings, the pantries, kitchen, store rooms, bakery and pastry establishment. One feature of the dining-room service is the sitting-room for waitresses, of which there will be such a number that each will have but four guests to care for.

To the rear of the store-room is the kitchen courtyard, inclosed by the buildings of the working department, including fuel store-rooms and laundry. This courtyard is entered by an arched gateway and is entirely screened from all parts of the hotel grounds.

The buildings in the rear, ending in a point, comprise a two-story dormitory building for the servants, including servants' dining-room, kitchen, pantries, sitting-room, library and a large ballroom equipped with a stage, and scenery, for the exclusive use of the hotel servants, of which there will be about 350.

On the side of the patio opposite the dining-room is a large ballroom with alcoved niches, on each side, richly decorated and upholstered in leather. At the end of the ballroom is a commodious stage which will be equipped with scenery and all other paraphernalia required in the presentation of dramatic or operatic entertainments.

In one of the front wings on the ground floor is a large library and parlor for the use of the "old folks," and in the basement of the other wing, but entirely above ground, because of the slope of the hillside, will be a playroom for the children. In the basement of this wing there will be a swimming pool.

The decorations throughout the building will be suggestive of the simple life. Through the main lobby, the men's and women's lounging rooms, and the sun parlor, the upper walls will be of a luscious poppy yellow and golden brown, with delicate ornaments in pale green. The ballroom will be decorated in gold and two tones of color, ivory and pale green.

The main dining-room will be, probably, the most original in its decorations of any room used for a similar purpose in the United States. The high vaulted ceilings will be flooded with light through stained glass windows, and at night will be illuminated by unseen lights producing a translucent effect with an alabaster glow.

The buffet is a circular room with a domed ceiling. The sides and walls of this room will be covered with stalactites, behind which the electric lights will be concealed.

Rambling around the building are verandas of extraordinary width.

So large an expanse of territory is covered by the building that anyone, starting from a given point and walking around the entire building, will have covered three-quarters of a mile before he again reaches his starting point.

The grounds comprise about twenty-six acres. In front is a hillside, covered with graceful orange groves, sloping off into the valley beyond, while on either side are deep ravines.

The plans were drawn by and the building erected under the supervision of Chas. F. Whittlesey, a San Francisco architect recently from the East, a designer of exceptional talent and originality who has won an enviable reputation as a constructor of large buildings in reinforced concrete in various parts of this country. Notably the great Auditorium recently finished in Los Angeles, the Hayward Hotel in that city, and the great Pacific office building now under construction at the corner of Fourth and Market streets in this city.

The Annals of Pickeye

We're peaceable, but if for cause
The eagle's roused, beware his claws!
Poor Mexico in silly rage
Kept poking at the game-bird's cage
Until she got it in the neck
From Brazos to Chapultepec,
And, whipped to thunder, had to split
Herself in two to make us quit.

That split was luckily ordained,
For what the Greasers lost we gained;
It gave us all the Golden West,
Of which this fair State is the best;
These realms swopped eagle-birds, the freak
Which holds the serpent in his beak,
More like a jay, was forced to yield
To him that clasps the shafts and shield.
And he'll protect us all alike
While shield can guard or shafts can strike.

Thus fate decreed this land should be
A dwelling for the brave and free,
And that no kings or concubines
Should ever rule the Southern Mines.
Then let's be faithful to our charge,
Let's build up Pickeye pure and large,
So that posterity shall say
We did no snide work in our day,
And not go down to shame and sorrow
Like poor old Sodom and Gomorrah.

Loud and prolonged applause rewarded the effort of the young Foothill Bard, and then Dobie Joe led off in "The Star Spangled Banner." It was sung with such enthusiasm and with so mighty a volume of sound that everybody voted it a triumph—though the singing was considerably out of tune. Elder Beals then pronounced a benediction, and the celebration was concluded.

But not the congratulations and glorification over its success. They continued in all directions—on the street corners and in the stores and restaurants, but chiefly in the Long Tom saloon, wither most of the paraders adjourned.

It was but a little while till this spirit of rejoicing and that with which it was mingled begot a feeling that the glorious day had not been sufficiently celebrated.

This sentiment first developed itself in Bowleg Tom, an old man-of-war's man, who swore the American flag had nowhere been hoisted high enough that day, and that he would fling it out from the top of the tallest pine-tree on the flat.

A flag was furnished him, which he fastened about his waist, and then, with a saw and hand-axe stuck in his belt, he shinned up a hundred-and-fifty-foot pine like a crack-a-jack. By a half-hour's hard work he cleared off the branches for fifty feet or so at the top, and floated the flag from the peak.

Bowleg Tom's achievement stirred an emulous spirit in others. It soon became evident from their modest assertions that Pickeye contained the best marksmen in the world, and a lot of wild target-shooting was indulged in to prove it. The crowning evidence came when Al Cleaves vowed he could make Arkansas's horse, which had become restive, as docile as a lamb by just "creasing" him over the withers, as Davy Crockett used to "bark" squirrels. In spite of the owner's protest the marksman tried the experiment—and succeeded in one respect, for he killed the animal as dead as a door nail. That ended the shooting.

From like assertion it was presently manifest that Pickeye had the fleetest runners on earth. A stadium, with the Long Tom as its terminus, was measured off in the main street. No record-breaking time was made, but the sport was kept up until Paddy McCann, who was barefoot, cut a toe off on a piece of broken bottle. Then the foot-racing ceased.

Quoits came under discussion next. It immediately became apparent that the discobuli of old were pitifully outclassed by the Pickeye adepts at the game. So, whirling horseshoes hurtled wildly through the air in front of the Long Tom, till one of them struck Coony Blaker in the head, knocking him endways, and there was a cessation of that sport also.

By this time the desire for renewing the celebration had become general, and it was proposed to carry it to benighted Whisky Flat, five miles down the river on the opposite side, which had not been represented in the parade. Accordingly a volunteer procession of unsteady men, headed by the brass band, filed cautiously across the footbridge and took up its line of march toward the sulking camp.

It had not gone far when Bowleg Tom—who, like most old sailors, ordinarily waddled like a duck, and was now so liquor-logged that he waddled worse than usual—announced his inability to go any farther. With the sympathetic spirit of comradeship his companions bemoaned his downfall, gave him a fresh bottle of whisky, tucked him nicely under a buckeye-bush to sleep away the time until their return, and then proceeded on their way.

If there had been any sulkiness on the part of the Whisky Flatters it vanished at the appearance of the procession, for they fell in line to a man, imbibing the spirit of the occasion and other things so freely that when, after encircling the camp repeatedly, the procession started homeward, every Whisky Flatter marched with it, leaving the place deserted.

Just at sundown the paraders reached the spot where they had left Bowleg Tom, and halted to arouse him and assist him back to town. But he didn't need arousing. They found him, covered with blood, picking shot out of his legs with a sheath-knife. Upon inspection it was discovered that he was peppered with shot from head to heels.

The ardor and excitement which had almost died out from over-exertion instantly flashed into life again. Here had been an attempt at murder—the murder of the patriot who had most distinguished himself! The crime should not go unpunished if a thousand avengers could ferret out the criminal!

Without waiting for an explanation, and despite the victim's assertion that he could walk well enough, he was dosed with the remainder of his bottle of whisky, placed on a hastily constructed litter and borne like a dead warrior on his shield proudly into Pickeye, the band playing a funeral march.

The gloomy cortege, the bleeding victim and the fiery denunciations of his comrades ignited the wrath of even the soberer and quieter townsmen, so that the cry for a blood atonement was unanimous.

Bowleg Tom had been lively enough when first found, but by the time he reached town, whether from the whisky drenching or that he had begun to take the funeral proceedings seriously, he was moribund. If he ever had a clear notion how he received his wounds the doping had obscured it, so nothing could be learned from him.

But some one had seen Pierre, the proprietor of the Pauvre Diable rotisserie, go across the river with his double-barreled shotgun that afternoon and return hurriedly shortly afterwards, slinking up a back street.

That was enough. Beyond a doubt Pierre was the assassin. He must be arrested at once.

When Napoleon III. was contemplating his coup d'état the stanch republicanism of the Garde Mobile caused him to be distrustful of them. To make sure they should give him no trouble he sent two shiploads of the most pronounced of them to San Francisco, in 1850, supplying every man with a double-barreled shotgun. These deported soldiers and their shotguns were thicker than hornets throughout the Southern Mines in the early days. At Sonora they were in such force that they boldly resisted the collection of the foreign miner's tax, and California came near having an insurrection on her hands.

Pierre was one of these Garde Mobile exiles. He had mined for a short while, but the business of restaurateur being more to his taste he engaged in it, opening the Pauvre Diable rotisserie in Pickeye. But he retained his beloved shotgun, and it was his habit to take an outing with it every afternoon and pop away at linnets and blackbirds, or anything else in the line of what his countrymen call "gibier."

When brought before the Lynch court that had been organized and was sitting in the Long Tom saloon, Pierre evidently was very frightened. He had reason to be. The room was full of angry men; Chancellor Kent, the judge, a grizzly old miner who owed his title to the identity of his name with that of the great jurist, was frowning like a Fouquier-Tinville; and the atmosphere generally was suggestive of the guillotine or gallows.

"Pierre, you are charged with the crime of attempting to murder Bowleg Tom," said the judge sternly to the scared little Frenchman. "Have you any counsel?"

"Je ne comprendez pas," replied the accused, with a dazed look.

The judge did not understand the words, but the prisoner's action made their meaning intelligible.

"Any attorney, any lawyer, any—"

"Oh, ze avocat!" interrupted Pierre. "I no 'ave im."

"Will you choose one yourself, or shall I appoint one for you?"

"Zey say Zheneral 'Ouston ees very good."

"But he has been chosen to prosecute you."

"Zen I am depreeved and loss!" exclaimed Pierre, with a despairing gesture.

"By no means," said the judge reassuringly; "there's no end of good legal talent present. Is there any other particular person you would like to defend you?"

"It makes no deefference, if not Zheneral 'Ouston."

"Then the court will appoint Dobie Joe to appear for the prisoner. Will you defend him, Dobie?"

"Certainly, the best I can," answered the big miner, coming forward.

A jury was quickly impaneled and sworn. Then the prisoner was formally charged, and asked to plead to the indictment.

"He pleads not guilty, of course," responded Dobie Joe.

"The prosecuting attorney will please proceed," said the judge, settling back in his chair in anticipation of the opening statement.

"May it please the court and gentlemen of the jury," began General Houston, assuming an imposing attitude and speaking in impressive tones, "in a long career of criminal practice I have never encountered so heinous a case as this. I have dealt with many flagrant crimes, but never with one involving those extremes of turpitude, the unpardonable sin and the impenitent thief. All murder is foul. But premeditated murder, with the deliberate purpose of robbery, is so unspeakably hideous that language has no term by which to properly characterize it. Such an intent was this. We shall prove how the assassin and robber stealthily tracked his victim until he found an opportunity to accomplish his object—the complete consummation of which, thank Heaven, an overruling providence beneficently thwarted! But the animus—the furor trucidendi et praedendi—is none the less atrocious for that interposition. The prisoner is as guilty as if he had succeeded in his attempt. To all intents and purposes murder has been done. We shall produce the corpus delicti in court, and ask of you a verdict and sentence that shall hang the felon by the neck till he is dead."

Pierre had understood very little of the impassioned harangue, but he caught the purport of the last sentence and felt himself already condemned to death. He shuddered and turned pale when the litter on which Bowleg Tom still lay stretched was brought into court.

"Your honor and gentlemen of the jury," said General Houston, waving his hand toward the litter, "here is the corpus delicti. Its production is ample proof, I take it, that the crime has been committed."

The judge looked at the gory spectacle and ruled that the evidence as to that point was sufficient.

Jerry Holt, the man who had seen the prisoner go across the river that day, was the first witness. When asked what he knew about the affair, he said:

"Well, all I know about it is that I saw Pierre go past my shop and across the footbridge this afternoon with his shotgun, but he does that almost every afternoon. The only thing different today was that he came back sooner than usual and sneaked up a back street."

"Was he running?"

"No, not running, but he was going a pretty lively gait."

"Did he exhibit any signs of guilt?"

"Well, I'm not an expert as to that, but it struck me he was trying to get to cover as soon as he could."

"That's all," said General Houston, with a superb air of satisfaction. "Take the witness."

"We don't want him," replied Dobie Joe.

The refusal of the defense to cross-examine made a profound impression on the court and crowd. It showed fear. There was a feeling that it about clinched the case.

"We have no other witnesses," said General Houston, after waiting for the impression to have its full effect. "This crime was one that the All-seeing Eye alone beheld. No human vision saw it. In addition to the testimony adduced—which every one of you must feel, as I do, to be direct, irrefragable and conclusive—I can only show you Bowleg Tom's bleeding wounds—poor, poor dumb mouths!—and bid them speak in thunder tones against his slayer. With that mute appeal ringing in your ears, the prosecution rests."

"Your honor, I ask that the prisoner be put on the stand," said Dobie Joe.

"Very well, if you desire it," assented the judge. "You will please take the witness-stand, Pierre."

The prisoner obeyed, but in a shambling and hang-dog way. His whole manner was against him.

"Did you go across the river with your shotgun this afternoon?" asked his counsel.

"Oui, yes."

"What did you go for?"

"For recreaceon, and to shoot ze leettle bird and rabbit."

"To hunt game, eh?"

"Oui, ze gibier."

"You didn't follow Bowleg Tom?"

"Non, I no follow 'im."

"Did you see him while there?"

"Non, I no see 'im."

The answer caused a sensation, it was so manifestly perjured. Even Dobie Joe was staggered, the reply was so contrary to what he had expected. He looked the witness steadily in the eye, and said solemnly:

"Be careful what you say, Pierre. This is a very serious matter. Are you sure you didn't see Bowleg Tom?"

"Parfaitment. I no see 'im till now."

There was an impatient stir in the crowd. This bald perjury was only too clear a proof of guilt. Judge and jury evidently saw it in that light too. Things were looking bad for the prisoner.

But just then Bowleg Tom, who had been tossing about uneasily for some time, having slept off his jag, sat upright and took in the situation at a glance.

"H—ll! have they rounded you up for peppering me, Pierre?" he exclaimed, with a hearty laugh. "Why, boys, he ain't any more to blame than an unborn babe. I heard him popping away, and when a flock of quails came running under the buckeye-bush where I was hid he let fly at them and hit me. The brush was so thick he couldn't see me, and when I yelled at him he run like the devil."

There was a sudden revulsion of feeling in the crowd. A shout of laughter went up which almost unsettled the propriety of the court. But General Houston was equal to the emergency. Rising with more than his customary aplomb and dignity, he said:

"Your honor, since the corpus delicti has gone back on us, I move that the pending charge against the prisoner be dismissed. But I bring two other counts against him: that of doli capax in posse, or of it being possible he might have been guilty; and that of being de facto non amicus curiae, or of having trifled with the time and dignity of this court. These are not capital crimes, but they are offenses punishable at the discretion of the bench. I trust the culprit will not be permitted to go altogether unwhipped of justice, but that your honor will mete out to him such punishment as his crimes deserve."

The dictum of General Houston was the only legal code Pickeye knew. In this instance it sounded so plausible that no one disputed it. Chancellor Kent pondered the matter with an air of profound thought for a considerable time before giving an opinion. Finally he said:

"Without wasting time by consulting other authorities the court will hold that the propositions advanced by the prosecuting attorney are valid. It is therefore ordered that the prisoner be discharged on the original count, but on those preferred by the distinguished prosecutor this court sentences him to supply a free supper, with wines, champagne and cigars, to as many of his fellow citizens as may desire the same. The sheriff for the people will see that the sentence is enforced. The court stands adjourned sine die."

A murmur of approbation told that the decision was recognized to be as just as a judgment of Solomon. It took a good deal of pigeon-talk to make Pierre understand his sentence. When its full meaning broke upon him he threw up his hands frantically and exclaimed:

"Mon dieu! but it ees unzhust! it ees ruin!"

"But it might have been a halter, Pierre," said Dobie Joe soothingly.

"Vraiment, zat ees true. C'est un arret juste, it ees a zhust sentence. I submeet. Allons, done! At ten o'clock ze souper will make itself ready. Vive la land of ze free and ze hum of ze brav!"

At ten o'clock sharp the crowd began to pour into the Pauvre Diable rotisserie. Pierre had kept faith and spread a feast that Lucullus might have gloated over, while the wine and cigars were inexhaustible.

General Houston rose above himself. By a speech which left nothing original to be said, he practically broke the mold of eloquence and put an extinguisher on oratory. Like his other speeches the colossal effort is lost, but the peroration and the effect produced by it made such an indelible impression that a synoptical version of it was committed to writing and preserved as the classic of classics in the archives of Pickeye.

"But to be great and free is not the only glory of a people," he said, after picturing the exaltedness of the nation in those respects; "they must also be just. The quality of justice is not indigenous to earth, it is of divine origin; but I proudly assert that the American people, and we of Pickeye particularly, have domesticated the heavenly exotic. This crowning glory is ours, that justice goes hand in hand with liberty. The proof of it is here. We might have hanged our noble entertainer. There was no power on earth to prevent us had we so willed. But our sense of justice told us the penalty would exceed his crimes, and induced us to commute it to a milder and more righteous one. Hail, Pierre! illustrious exemplar and beneficiary of our grandest virtue! I pledge you in this vintage of your own sunny France. Ah, magic name! France! As into Richelieu, in one moment there passes into me the spirit of France. Vive la Republique! one and indivisible! Liberty, equality, fraternity! But above all, Fiat justitia ruat caelum!"

"C'est la Revolution sans la Terreur!" exclaimed Pierre.

Then; beating his chest like a gorilla, and in stentorian tones, he burst forth in the soul-stirring strain:

"Allons, enfants de la patrie, La jour de gloire est arrive!"

The fervor of General Houston's apostrophe and of Pierre's outburst was infectious. The whole concourse joined in the grand chant, and by a common impulse Pierre was enthroned on a table and the crowd began whirling madly about him.

"An apocalypse of the spirits of just men made perfect!" ejaculated Elder Beals, who was a sober but sympathetic spectator.

And so, with most of the celebrators singing the "Marseillaise" and "Ca ira" and dancing the Carmagnole around a frenzied and plundered Frenchman, the curtain went down on the first Fourth of July celebration at Pickeye.

SUMMONS.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Department No. 10, No. 5390.

JAMES F. STRODE, Plaintiff,

vs.

LILLIAN STRODE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said City and County of San Francisco.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, SEND GREETING TO LILLIAN STRODE, DEFENDANT.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's wilful desertion, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any further relief demanded in the complaint.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court at City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 2d day of January, A. D. 1907.

Our Incorrigible Mayor

A correspondent of the Oakland Tribune is authority for the report that Mayor Schmitz is indulging the hope of being vindicated again at the polls. If this is true then the Mayor must also be indulging the hope that meanwhile the question of his guilt or innocence will not be determined by the courts. That the law's delays will not be exhausted by election day is not improbable. But it is unlikely that in the event of the Schmitz case hanging fire until the next campaign there shall be reason for us to be apprehensive of the Mayor's political designs. For since the Mayor's last vindication at the polls the impulse of self-preservation, which is the root of selfishness, has inspired the community, and the star-eyed goddess of reform has become the favorite deity of many citizens who were wont to view with complaisance the devious ways of his Honor and his mentor. Indulgent merchants who were flattered by the smiles of the powerful boss and who nodded approval to his faithful puppet, have lately been constrained to celebrate the advantages of honesty in government. Through absorption in the petty interests of personal welfare they have become horrified at the costliness of sympathy with corruption. The high price of insurance and high cost of living being obviously due in a large measure to conditions resulting from the zeal of public officials for their own interests and their neglect of the public interests have caused a revolution of sentiment. Through long chafing and friction, as Carlyle says of the French on the eve of the Revolution, the public temper "has got electric." Incompetency and stupidity, the offspring of immorality, have disgusted men with the atrophy of the civic virtues. When the iceman raised the price of his commodity because of the wear and tear of his trucks he contributed to the stimulus to virtue. We are being purified by affliction. The iniquities of the Administration are inspiring the people to righteousness. It is not that we love virtue for its own sake. Selfishness is the evangelist of the gospel that abominates graft. Indirectly and unintentionally the Mayor himself has become the scourge and chastiser of the city. But we are not gluttons; and therefore his Honor is likely to be grievously disappointed should he seek vindication again. In the role of vindication seeker he has become something of a bore. For it appears that with each fresh term in office he puts himself in need of a new certificate of character. And as elections do not keep pace with his transgressions he finds it necessary to vindicate himself in the interval, as, for example, when he decreed that all blots on his escutcheon that antedated the eighteenth of April were barred by the statute of limitations. The unfortunate man is manifestly incorrigible. It is time for him to realize that the city itself is in need of vindication and that a mighty advantage would accrue to the public if he should cease from troubling.

The Japanese Imbroglia

Like a bolt out of the blue was the startling news from Washington last week respecting the imminence of war with Japan. Nowhere was the news more unexpected than right here in San Francisco. In the Eastern States the imbroglia precipitated by our relegation of Japanese to Oriental schools was taken seriously from the beginning, and from the tone of the European press it is clear that the complications are regarded as portentous, but to us the controversy has appeared to be of a purely academic character. We were entirely insensible to the gravity of the situation. So when we learned that the President and his Cabinet were excited on account of the corrugated brow of the Japanese Minister, and that our School Directors had received a hurry call from Washington, we were at first incredulous. The troublesome question, so far as we understood, was to be brought into court for solution and meanwhile discussion of it would be in vain. But it appears that Japan is under no obligations to wait upon the machinery of our government. The treaty is explicit enough in the opinion of Japanese statesmen, and they are not required to sit idly by until our courts determine whether the Federal authorities have the right to enforce the supreme law of the land. But it would be no great stretch of courtesy for them to do so. And if they are too impatient to extend that courtesy it is because they are eager for a pretext for war. And if they are as eager as some European authorities of the first rank believe, we shall not be able to preserve peace by settling the school question to their satisfaction. It might be well for us, however, to have that question more generally understood. For misapprehension respecting the merits of the case is widespread. A recent discussion of it in the London Saturday Review was brought to a close with these words: "By the way it is stated in an article in the North American Review that not only children but Japanese adult men wish to attend the Californian schools. This would certainly go to justify the Californian's objection, but it must surely be of quite rare occurrence." We have been informed that our school authorities were impelled to discriminate mainly for the reason that Japanese adults were attending the primary schools. Japanese minors, we believe, constitute a very small minority of the Japanese public school pupils. It is inconceivable that the school authorities discriminate against Japanese children merely because they are Japanese. "Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven," was not said in reference only to the children of the Jews, or the Gentiles or of any other creed, or of any particular race. We should feel humiliated to learn that in this Christian country children were discriminated against merely because they were heathens. Japanese children have been relegated to the Oriental school along with Japanese adults, but it is probably because they need special attention owing to their unfamiliarity with the language. There are many reasons that might be advanced for assigning Japanese children to an Oriental school quite in consonance with regulations of a purely scholastic nature and which should not occasion umbrage. Our School Directors have not been very generous with their explanations respecting the animus of their conduct, but we believe it has been generally assumed in this city that the Japanese adult was the principal inspiration of their discriminatory order. It is to be hoped they will make it clear we have no absurd prejudices against Japanese children.

The Imminence of War

In England publicists and statesmen have been on the alert for an ultimatum from Japan ever since the protest was made against the action of our school authorities. That protest was diagnosed as a premonitory symptom of war and from the speculations of the press it was evident that European sentiment attributed to Japan a purpose prejudicial to this country on account of the notion prevalent in Tokio that the Japanese policy of expansion is not to be realized while we are in possession of the Philippines. In the judgment of European statesmen and publicists the Japanese, since their triumph over the colossal Russian Empire, have not only developed an extremely sensitive susceptibility to affront but are incidentally looking for trouble. Japan, said one authority, some weeks ago, is the kill-joy in the European agapemone. And according to another writer the Japanese have become so arrogant that some white races are beginning to experience a singular cooling in the enthusiasm with which they received at first an Asiatic race as an equal among the Great Powers. "But," he added, "there is no resisting the logic of the sword." And a London writer, discussing the school imbroglio, said, "The momentous decision may be postponed as the exigency may not be Japan's now for the moment, but the difficulty is of so grave a nature that its existence seems the menace of the hour." But perhaps the most interesting discussion incident to the irritation of the Japanese is that which deals with the probable attitude of England in the event of war. Just before the arrangement of the Peace of Portsmouth England and Japan entered into a treaty which binds each signatory to aid the other provided either should find itself engaged in war with any other single Power. The purpose of this treaty was to safeguard British India against Russian invasion and to deter Russia from reconstructing her navy for another contest with Japan in the Far East. Now the question is would she have to place her armies and fleets at the disposal of Japan in the event of war with this country. The terms of the treaty are explicit. The question must be answered in the affirmative unless we consider the likelihood of England's repudiating the compact. The matter has lately been discussed in the House of Commons, and the sentiment of many of the M. P.'s is that the people of England would force the Government to repudiate the treaty if Japan engaged in war with the United States. For if we invaded Canada and cut off the grain fields of British North America from communication with the Atlantic seaboard, and also prohibited the exportation of foodstuffs from this country to England, there would soon be famine in the tight little isle. It is because British statesmen conceive the relations between the United States and Japan to be at the snapping point that they have been discussing the treaty obligations of their country. The circumstance should persuade us that the strong man armed is the only efficient guardian of the gates of Janus. A Pacific fleet more powerful than the whole Japanese navy would be an absolute guaranty of peace at this time.

Our Naval Strength

In consequence of the President and his Cabinet becoming apprehensive of trouble with Japan there will soon be a rearrangement of our naval fleets, and this is a consummation of considerable importance to the Pacific Coast. It was suggested in Town Talk some months ago that in view of our paramount interests in the Pacific it was absurd for us to maintain a preponderance of our naval strength in the Atlantic, and we are now pleased to learn that there are Federal Authorities of the same opinion. There is no European Power except England that would select the Atlantic Coast for the scene of hostilities in a war with this country, because none save England has an adequate naval base in the Atlantic. With the Philippines so poorly guarded as they are by land and sea they will always engage the attention of the enemies of this country. Besides possession of the Philippines is necessary to the expansion of two Asiatic Powers, China and Japan, and also of Germany which has six naval stations in the western Pacific. Possession of the Philippines would be of great strategic importance to Japan because those islands command all the approaches to China. Germany in possession of the Philippines would hold the balance of power between China and Japan. And yet in a military sense the Philippines are almost entirely neglected by this country. England recently expressed her confidence in the amity of the United States by a redistribution of her naval strength practically abandoning the Atlantic. So now our military experts are urging the rearrangement of our naval resources. It has been suggested that at least three battleships could be spared from the Atlantic fleet. At present our Asiatic fleet consists of only four armored cruisers, five protected cruisers, six gunboats, five torpedo boats and a squadron of light draught vessels for river and harbor service. The heaviest ordnance carried is an 8-inch gun. Japan could make short work of our Asiatic fleet with a few battleships and could capture Manila with scarcely more difficulty than attended Dewey's achievement.

Jingo British Criticism

If anything could heighten the pleasure everywhere expressed in America at the appointment of James Bryce as British Ambassador to Washington, it would be the ill-natured comments that his assignment has called forth from those English journals which never miss an opportunity to show their hatred of all things American. It would be hard to recall a time when so much envious and spiteful criticism has been written about any act involving the two countries that are always supposed to be reaching across the Atlantic to clasp each other in affectionate embrace. Just at present the British "hands across the sea," some of them at least, are wielding pens steeped in the quintessence of gall. The Saturday Review, for instance, hates these United States with a hatred that is hardly equaled by its hatred of the Liberal party that is responsible for Bryce's appointment. The Saturday Review does not approve of Mr. Bryce's book on American institutions but it professes inability to conceive any reason except the writing of the "American Commonwealth" for his appointment. After sweetly hinting that perhaps Mr. Bryce had made so disastrous a failure in Ireland that Campbell-Bannerman was anxious to get rid of him and had therefore seen fit to exile him to Washington, it rejects this explanation, aware, perhaps, that no reader would take it seriously. It goes on to say that Mr. Bryce's will be a familiar name to educated Americans and owing to the tone of his book, a persona grata. "That is what probably weighed most with the Prime Minister," the Saturday Review complains; for "Americans might safely be expected to receive with open arms an Englishman, a Scotchman to be exact, who has recorded with enthusiasm his conviction that the United States has a far greater and more brilliant future to look forward to than the British Empire." This suggests some terrible misgivings to the Saturday Review. "It is a question whether Mr. Bryce will not represent America when his business is to represent England." The results are awful to contemplate. "If his head be against America" in differences between the two countries, "his heart will always be on her side; and his heart will pull his head around." And now we have a chance to learn where the soreness lies. "Should there be an opportunity, we may look for more Alaskan surrenders. Americans will be able to build their canals and revise their copyright with as little respect for British interests as before. It is safe to snub the British lion has long been a maxim of American diplomacy. Mr. Bryce may be trusted to convert it into an axiom. Canada may well look askance at his appointment." And so on to the verge of tears.

"A Meticulous Pedant"

The Pall Mall Gazette is equally bitter but as becomes a paper that so often mirrors royalty, shows better breeding in making its moan. "Mr. Bryce would be an acceptable Ambassador to any country which had outstanding or possible differences for settlement with Great Britain and desired to get as much as possible of its own way. Mr. Bryce represents the school in whose eyes Great Britain is almost invariably in the wrong, and which looks upon the surrender of national contentions as the highest virtue." But the most extraordinary fusillade that has been aimed at the venerable head of the new representative of the court of St. James comes from editor L. J. Maxse of the National Review. Maxse hates Germany and the United States with an equally ferocious hatred and has the English imperialist's lofty contempt for a Little Englander. It would not do to mar his gunnery by abridging him, so here is the full clatter of his verbal hot shot:

"British Embassies are henceforward to become the dumping-grounds for political 'deadheads.' Having deliberately created a vacancy in Washington by compelling Sir Mortimer Durand to retire, because he was supposed to be 'out of touch' with the White House, and therefore incapable of looking after British interests, the Home Government, after an unconscionable delay, which encouraged the public to hope for better things, has selected a meticulous pedant in the person of Mr. Bryce, who has never been 'in touch' with anyone. The Irish Chief Secretary, like the majority of Irish Chief Secretaries, is a pronounced failure, whom Sir Anthony Macdonnell has long wanted to get rid of. That the Washington Embassy should be employed for this purpose is a public scandal. Mr. Bryce's supposed qualification is his authorship of a fulsome panegyric upon the American Constitution, which was many years out of date at the time it was written, and is now one of the most obsolete books in our libraries. M. Taine made this delightful criticism upon the 'American Commonwealth': 'On dirait que M. Bryce voudrait etre President.' The new Ambassador's disqualifications are obvious. He is a hopeless prig and an inveterate Little Englander, which will put him utterly out of sympathy with the Imperialism of the 'powers that be' in the United States, while as a pro-German he will exercise a mischievous influence on our international relations. Moreover, the appointment of a notorious pro-Boer excites the legitimate suspicions of Canadians who know that he will make it his business to sacrifice their interests on every possible occasion. It would be difficult to make a worse appointment. It is particularly hard on our diplomatic service, which contains several members among its younger men who are fully qualified for this particular position. We would counsel our readers not to be taken in by American enthusiasm over Mr. Bryce's appointment."

A Swettenham would doubtless be more acceptable to the jingo British press, in the role of Ambassador to America, than so courteous a gentleman as Mr. Bryce.

Bends of the River

By George Ives

The river seems shut in at every bend,
But on it flows.
And life appears to kindle and to end,
But yet, who knows?

The stream is never bounded by that shore
Which our eyes view,
As we draw near, long reaches and still more Spread out anew.

So life may prove a rill that always ran Eternally.
Which shall not cease, since never birth began,
Its mystery.

Perspective Impressions.

There is virtuous influence enough in New York to compel the withdrawal of "Salome" from the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House, but not enough to raise a zephyr of protest against diffusing the effluvia of the Thaw case.

The Los Angeles Times objects to President Roosevelt's eulogy of General Robert E. Lee because General Lee fired on the flag. Are we never to be permitted to forget that incident? General Otis should reflect that the whole country has kindly forgotten about that Rubicon episode in which he figured.

The Missouri Legislature wants to limit each woman to two hats a year. The average woman can beat that law by making her hats over. There is no limit to the number of styles into which one hat may be transformed.

A Baptist clergyman in St. Louis is suspected of heresy because among other things he can't see any mystic meaning in the Song of Songs. Let us hope that it is not essential to salvation to discern nothing but spiritual significance in Solomon's addresses to the Shulamite.

"Commentators on our Government," says the Bulletin, "have remarked often that the ablest men in the country are seldom found in the service of the nation." The explanation is easy: able men seldom have to chase jobs and when they do they find that mediocrity excels in alertness.

A writer tells us the Federal Government has unlimited authority to make treaties but not unlimited authority to enforce them. There is probably no use in appealing from this distinguished journalist to that tribunal of inferior jurisdiction, the Supreme Court of the United States, and yet it is quite possible that the court may be ass enough to decide that the Constitution is not so ridiculous an instrument as is implied by the dictum that it creates authority for a vain purpose.

Governor Swettenham may have been insane when he wrote an insulting letter to Admiral Davis, but if so his conduct was singularly in accord with his characteristic temperament. He has been notorious for his boorishness all his life. Consequently his insult to Davis was a consistent performance. In other words he was true to form.

Verona of Many Memories

By Herman Scheffauer.

Verona, a name that melts with its own music and is dyed in romance, Italian and English Elizabethan. It is a name that connotes Juliet as Juliet connotes Romeo and both connote Shakespeare. Over it flutters a light of rose-tinged pasts, melodious with lutes and nightingales and gay with silken ladies and gallants in flower-embroidered gardens. Life and Love feast amid the flowers, but there too the worm gnaws in his strength, sapping it all, and we remember in sad conclusion, the curtain's solemn fall upon tragic groups on theater stages lit up by memory.

The approach to Verona, after passing from sight of the blue Lago di Garda and Breseia on the plain, is not inspiring. The country is still part of the uninteresting Lombardian flatland and the agriculture appears sparse and meagre. Nor is Verona itself a place that obtrudes its beauty or romance with any emphasis. It is a city ancient and worn by time and possesses the unostentatious life of a third-rate Italian town burdened with great remnants of mediaevalism and oppressed by a slumberous peace. Yet in its stones, grooved by centuries, lie dreams a-plenty and its name is a lure and a light to all who love.

The streets are granite-paved and wind and twist, fortress with keep and bastion rise frowning by the river, castles overmaster the hills, walls are pierced with loopholes and toothed with embrasures and ancient bridges span the rapid Adige. In this river are to be seen most curious structures, big barges carrying cumbrous mills, like Noah's arks, anchored in the stream, whose swift current turns the ponderous wheels as would a mill-race. These black monsters, splashed with white flour, sit grimly in the river like stubborn hippopotami grinding corn with their stony teeth beneath the shadows flung by nobly-domed cathedrals and formidable battlements. Verona toils but lightly and gracefully; this patrician dame deigns only to weave silks, velvets and woollens.

This day was one of the many holy days of the Italian calendar. A peacefulness more profound than usual lay brooding over the town. At noon most of the shops were closed. Strolling idly about in an unknown part of the city, far from the hotel quarter, my hunger soon ceased to be artistic and became gastronomic. Not a ristorante was there to be seen, nor even a humbler trattoria; nothing but wine-shops—vendita vino. Yet through the narrow streets came an appetising scent of cookery, public or private, that bade me persevere. At length I discovered a bright, respectable little place where an excellent meal was served me by a plump waitress with jet-black hair and eyes. She was plump as a dove and at every breath her little bodice drew tight the confining buttons. She was the youthful epitome of her mother, the proprietress of the place. So must the mother have looked when young, so would the daughter look when old—a thought that was enough to sadden one's soup. In Italy no one is afraid of displaying the affections, and to one who comes from climes of closer convention, the sweet spectacle of human love presents itself with more absorbing insistence than all the wonders of art or the state of royal lands. So, in these transcripts from the Italian life as seen by me, this element of the natural affections can no more be ignored than the sun and the skies beneath which I observed it. Torn from its setting it seems mere trivialty here and now, but there and then it was like a shining splinter broken from the soul of a people. Eternal tale of Romeo and Juliet! Verona lent this instance an additional significance. A swarthy youth, evidently a petty merchant, sat at one table and under the tolerant eye of the mother would venture upon little affectionate liberties with the prepossessing daughter. Maria was the girl's name, for so both the mother and the youth addressed her—and Gaetano was the name of her admirer, for so daughter and mother addressed him. His black eyes followed her everywhere as she served the dinners; her own face was flushed with the heat and her cheeks glowed redly with the smouldering blood from her happy Italian heart. Yes, it was the old eternal tale! Beyond the years I saw the youth turned into a steady burgher of Verona and his wife had grown into the very image of her mother. That was a sad, long thought.

Six bridges cross the Adige, some of massive stone, others frail structures of iron and wood. Along both banks of the river run broad esplanades, finely paved and modern in their sense of room. Here the idler inhabitants hang over balustrade or parapet content to watch the rolling of the river, the threshing of the anchored mills or the women washing clothes upon a granite ledge sloping into the water. The great floating mills tug at their chains and make a splashing sound, the square church towers arise at intervals along the perspective of the river front, the clouds drift on, the hours go their way "and I go too."

I go through the tortuous streets, now broad, now narrow, without set purpose except to see, without any fixed direction apart from an onward one. Let a city take a wanderer into its maze or its turmoil and lure him hither and thither, whithersoever his feet, obedient to his fancy, impel him or the streets impose no barrier, ranging in unfettered liberty and slave not even to Time. So I drift by churches or into them, from streets white with an undimmed sun, into the comparatively inky gloom of S. Maria Antica to stand before the imposing tomb of the Scaligers, or by the bronze gates of S. Zeno Maggiore, the church that holds the tomb of Charlemagne's father Pepin the Short. A square, truncated tower stands forth between the street walls, and making for this, I suddenly burst upon the Piazza Erbe, one of the most picturesque squares in Europe. In Roman times here stood the forum; to-day it is the fruit and flower market. Its composition is

(In Seven Chapters)

THE ORIGIN AND DEDICATION OF THE PICKEYE GRAVEYARD

Few interior towns of California had a cemetery at all in 1851, and to this day there never has been one to rival the old Pickeye graveyard.

In a region and time of careless burials it stood out monumental, not only in its attestation of respect for the dead, but as an evidence of public spirit, of advanced ideas, and of an inspired foresight into the requirements of a boom mining camp.

During July the social atmosphere of Pickeye had been portentous of a tragedy. Up to that time a gambler named Cross—commonly called Double Cross—was unanimously conceded to be the most dangerous man in the camp, and in consequence he had been peaceable as a lamb. His record of half a score of victims in other places rendered it unnecessary for him to make a new one in Pickeye.

But a disrespect for his title of "chief" was shown by a new-comer, Frogmouth Pete, who insinuated that he also had a string of scalps to his credit and was somewhat of a sachem himself. He and Double Cross had been walking around and around, turkey fashion, for a whole month, each apparently indifferent, but keen to see that the other didn't get the drop on him. Everybody felt that the comedy part of the performance was about played out and that the tragic scene might come at any minute.

The Saturday night inflow of miners was greater than usual the evening of July 27, 1851, for the river was being flumed for miles above and below by scores of companies and the adjacent dry diggings were swarming with men.

The Long Tom saloon had seldom been more crowded, and never more brilliant and festive. The string band had been augmented by a cornet, and a lansquinet and two faro games were running, the latter presided over respectively by Double Cross and Frogmouth Pete, and the former by Madame Josephine, who was the wife or something else of Cross.

The gaming, drinking and conversation were at flood tide when a horseman rode up to the door at an easy lope, dismounted and entered the saloon. He was so dusty that his features were scarce distinguishable, but the jingling of his big Mexican spurs at once revealed his identity, for there was a general exclamation of "Hello, here's Arkansaw!"

"You're just the crowd I wanted to meet," he said to a group of miners near the bar. "I'm so dry I can't drink enough by myself, I'd like a dozen or two of you fellows to help. Come, Dobie Joe, Cape Ann, J-B, and the rest of you, stand in with me."

"Hadn't you better have a hydraulic nozzle turned down your throat?" suggested Dobie Joe.

"I could stand it, I reckon. It's been a scorcher out on the range. I never rounded up such a thirst before."

"I guess it's epidemic," said Cape Ann; "everybody seems to be drinking as if they eat nothing but salt codfish and mackerel."

"Well, Cap Ryan shall mix an anaconda punch for every one of us. That's the kind of a drink for weather like this—something that's at once cold and hissing, and seems to squirm along thirty or forty feet while going down your throat. Do you hear, Cap?"

"All right," replied the bartender, and proceeded to compound the serpentine beverages.

"Has the express-rider got in to-night?" inquired Arkansaw.

"No, but I guess that's him," said Cape Ann, catching the sound of a footstep on the porch.

The speaker was wrong, for the person who presently entered was neither travel-stained nor equipped for riding. He might have been mistaken for a gambler, for he wore the black frock coat affected by the sporting fraternity of that day; but he wore it by right of an older conventionality, for he was a clergyman. It was Elder Beals, in fact.

As he modestly entered the room, with an animated look upon his face and a tin horn under his arm, there was an immediate abatement of the prevalent boisterousness, for everybody knew him, and, apart from the esteem in which he was personally held, there was a lingering respect for his calling in even the rudest of the crowd.

Arkansaw felt it to be his duty, as the general entertainer at that moment, to welcome the new-comer, so he said:

"Good evening, Elder Beals. We're just taking a drink; will you join us?"

"Thank you very much, Mr. Arkansaw, but I must beg to be excused. I'm not pharisaical, but it wouldn't be becoming for me to indulge, even if I had the inclination to do so."

"Well, I supposed you wouldn't, but I thought I'd ask you, just for sociability," said Arkansaw apologetically.

"I fully understand and appreciate your good will," replied Elder Beals, in a tone that implied a sense of obligation. "But though I decline your kindness in this respect, the good will and assistance of you all in another direction will be thankfully accepted."

"Just call your game, Elder, and you'll see us all stand in like thoroughbreds," said Dobie Joe, and the others signified their approval.

"Thank you, gentlemen, I expected as much, from the generosity I have always experienced in this camp," returned Elder Beals. Then casting his eyes about and seeing that he had the whole roomful for an audience, he coughed a little to preen his vocal chords for an oratorical flight, and continued: "My purpose in coming here to-night is to provide for the location and inclosure of a graveyard. A respectful care for the dead is one of the first duties as well as

Dr. Dille's Triumphant Reticence

There has been a good deal of popular interest manifested in the reticence of the Rev. Dr. Dille of Oakland, a reticence upon which may be founded one of his innumerable claims to distinction. Close watch was kept on Dr. Dille by psychological students fearful the while that he would emerge from his shell and forswear his reticence. For the provocation, it must be confessed, was tremendous. It required stupendous moral courage to maintain an aspect of invincible obduracy amid the storms of public clamor that raged over Oakland and that were expressive of a vulgar curiosity. But the Rev. Dr. Dille never flinched. His moral courage never faltered. And at this writing his superb reticence is triumphant. There are some ethical authorities upon whom the ruggedness of Dr. Dille's reticence has not made a favorable impression, but that is a circumstance due to the obliquity of their viewpoint. It is not the business of a minister of the gospel to assuage vulgar curiosity. Indeed to discourage it is one of the duties of the zealous clergyman. When Dr. Dille, during the course of one of his edifying sermons, took occasion to affirm the existence of a milliner in Oakland who advised her shop-girls to swell their incomes with the wages of sin, his purpose was merely to startle his hearers, to arouse them to the growing wickedness of a city that was rapidly expanding to metropolitan proportions. It was far from his intention to propitiate his circle with bitterness against offences that are most unlike his own. Nor was he designedly sensationalism. He was inveighing on that occasion against public evils and he played no favorites.

By Way of Palliation

Perhaps Dr. Dille was guilty of an indiscretion in affirming his willingness to divulge the name of the milliner since he had no intention of doing so. But strange are the caprices of ebb and flow in the deeps of human impulses. And anyway a minister cannot be adapting his sermons to the scruples and infirmities of public taste. In these piping times of sin and depravity a minister charged with a palpitating message to humanity cannot wait for it to be mellowed and tempered by long reflection and the higher influences of the soul. His business is to catch the drowsy ear of the public, to take a popular tide at the flood, to dash off something that will hold 'em for awhile, something to make them sit up in their pews and take notice. In the circumstances mild improprieties of logic, rhetoric and taste are to be expected.

Merely a Question

Dr. Dille might have been less specific. He need not have said it was a milliner that gave wicked advice to poor girls, but having said so why should all the milliners have got so excited over so broad an allusion? If he had said it was a member of the Ebell Club would every woman in that chaste and highly respectable organization have felt humiliated? Well, that is a question not to be answered offhand, but it is not likely that Dr. Dille would have mentioned the Ebell Club in so scandalous a manner. There are indiscretions against which instinct safeguards even the most imprudent clergymen. The ladies of the millinery business are not expected to be so sensitive as the ladies of a swell club. But these rambling digressions are without significance. The salient features of the whole affair are Dr. Dille's stolid reticence, his courageous indifference to public clamor, the Christian fortitude with which he endures caustic criticism, his grim determination to withhold the name of the wicked milliner, who, perhaps, were it divulged, would sue him for slander, but that is the least of the distinguished gentleman's troubles. He is reticent not because he is afraid of a slander suit, but because he wishes to discourage vulgar curiosity.

When the Vatican Gets Busy

Though nothing has been said of late respecting the appointment of Archbishop Montgomery's successor I shall not be surprised if the Vatican takes some action in the very near future affecting the interests of this diocese. Pope Pius X is a very energetic man, and unlike his predecessor he keeps in touch with the machinery of his church in the most remote parts of the world, taking a lively interest in matters that are usually deemed of minor importance and that have heretofore been entrusted to subordinates. That he does not take it for granted that all church dignitaries are efficient is evidenced from the fact that he has been conducting an investigation of the affairs of European provinces. In one of them he found a Bishop who had outlived his usefulness and shortly thereafter the Bishop resigned. This diocese has grown so much in importance of recent years that the matter of the appointment of a successor to Archbishop Montgomery is not likely to be long neglected, especially as Archbishop Riordan is not a man of robust constitution and has not been able to give a vast amount of attention to his duties.

When it was reported last week that there were prospects of a clash with Japan the mind of the average citizen turned seriously to thoughts of the navy. For it is upon the navy that we must place our main reliance in the event of war with Japan, and the man in whom we shall take a lively interest is the famous seadog to whom Kipling inscribed these lines many years ago:

Zogbaum draws with a pencil
And I do things with a pen,
But you sit up in a conning tower
Bossing eight hundred men.

Zogbaum takes care of his business
And I take care of mine,
But you take care of ten thousand tons
Sky-hooting through the brine.

Zogbaum can handle his shadows
And I can handle my style,
But you can handle a ten-inch gun
To carry seven mile.

To him that hath shall be given,
And that's why these books are sent
To the man who has lived more stories
Than Zogbaum or I could invent.

Those lines were written by Kipling on the fly-leaf of one of the volumes of an edition of his works and addressed to Captain Evans, U. S. N., who is now senior rear-admiral and the commander-in-chief of our navy's strongest fleet—the North Atlantic Squadron. He now bosses eight battleships that go "sky-hooting" through the brine and were we to engage in war, the President, who is one of "Fighting Bob's" greatest admirers, would unquestionably transfer him instantaneously to the Pacific. Even now the President is trying to have created for him the rank of vice-admiral.

His Career.

Evans is a Virginian by birth, and sixty years of age. He has been a fighter all his life. When only thirteen years old he was fighting Indians on the plains and in one fight had his right ankle pierced by an arrow. Washakie, a friendly Indian chief, took such a fancy to the lad that he tried to kidnap him. One year later, in 1860, Bob was on the frigate Constitution as an acting midshipman. When the Civil War broke out, he ignored his mother's entreaties to follow his brother's example by donning the Confederate gray, so she wrote out his resignation and sent it to Washington. He intercepted it by telegraph. He was in the attack on Fort Fisher and was hit three times before he fell. In the hospital at Norfolk he overheard the surgeon in charge say to his assistant: "Take both legs off in the morning." Bob slipped a pistol under his pillow, and when the assistant came in the morning to prepare him for the operation, he pulled out his gun and said he would kill anybody that attempted to cut off his legs. The legs were saved.

A Compliment From an Emperor

James Creelman tells a story that illustrates the preparedness of "Fighting Bob." At the opening of the Kiel canal in 1895 Evans was there with the Columbia, and one night he had Emperor William as a guest. Just before leaving the ship the Emperor asked him how long it would take to close all the water-tight doors. Evans replied, "About thirty seconds in the day, but about two minutes at night." With a merry twinkle in his eye the Emperor asked him if he would mind closing them. "Certainly not," said Evans, turning to blow the siren signal for the closing only to find that the steam was so low the siren would not make a sound. "Ah, ha! Captain!" said Wilhelm. "You see you cannot close your bulkheads at all." At that moment Evans touched the general alarm button calling all hands to quarters and in a moment the crew was swarming up. In exactly a minute and a half by the Emperor's watch all the water-tight compartments were closed.

"Captain," said the Emperor, "I cannot conceive of a ship being in better condition."

His Courage at Valparaiso

It was in 1891 that Evans won the sobriquet of "Fighting Bob." In that year he was sent to Valparaiso to assist Captain Schley of the Baltimore in a fracas with the Chilians. At one time, during the absence of the Baltimore, he confronted with his single gunboat ten forts and the whole Chilian squadron and threatened to open fire if an attempt were made to seize two American refugees who had taken refuge under the flag.

Harrison and Humphrey

Scheduled for Friday night of this week is a banquet at which is to be celebrated the concurrence of Mr. William F. Humphrey in the deeds of Mr. William Greer Harrison. For be it known grim-visaged turmoil hath smoothed his wrinkled front and stern alarms and jangling dissonances have been changed to tuneful harmonies and alluring melodies. In other words the affairs of the Olympic club are once more running on a smooth track. Mr. William F. Humphrey, the attorney, and Mr. William Greer Harrison, the interminable President, have adjusted their differences, and henceforth there will be no incentive to perfervid oratory at the meetings of the directors. There have been many stormy meetings of those directors since the fire and all because Mr. Humphrey, who is a man with the courage of his convictions, had the temerity to question the wisdom of the President and seek to rescind his acts. The attitude of Mr. Humphrey was decidedly heterodox. To find a precedent for it one had to wander back into the dim past to that period in the history of the club when William P. Lawlor, now a judge of the superior court, met Mr. Harrison in the club hustings and thundered against a project that he conceived to be prejudicial to the club's interests. But since the memorable controversy Mr. Harrison has proved a great benefactor to the club. He is recognized as the man that put the club on its feet. For years he has been given free rein in the management of the club and though there are always several nominal directors they take suggestion from Mr. Harrison as a cat laps milk.

The Futility of Opposition

The rift in the lute came with the election of Mr. Humphrey to the Board of Directors. Mr. Humphrey is one of the most conscientious of men and when, after the fire, he learned that Mr. Harrison had employed an architect, a Mr. Schultz, to prepare plans for a new building, he lost no time in putting in a protest. He was in favor of putting the plans into competition. Over this matter there was a very hot debate and it almost led to the resignation of President Harrison. It appears that Architect Schultz had been employed before the fire to prepare plans for alterations in the old building, and that he had made a trip East to familiarize himself with athletic club buildings and equip himself for the advancement of the Olympic Club's interests. Harrison succeeded in winning the fight for Schultz. Then followed a fight over the contract for the construction of the building and Harrison was again triumphant. The Thompson-Starrett Company, with which Allan Pollok, who is a director of the club, is associated, got the contract. Pollok then resigned from the directorate, and Humphrey succeeded in electing Postmaster Fisk to the vacancy. When it was all over a dinner in Humphrey's honor was proposed. For Harrison triumphant was in a most amiable mood, and with the sweet breath of flattery he conquered strife. But Humphrey would not consent to be a guest of honor at a dinner. So then it was decided to give a dinner for the fun of the thing and Humphrey agreed to attend. It will doubtless be a great love feast, and hereafter when Mr. Harrison gives reasons that may seem to Mr. Humphrey as two grains of wheat in two bushels of chaff the attorney will probably remember the futility of his efforts to persuade the directors in opposition to the President, and confess the irrefutable logic of Mr. Harrison's position.

London and the Pirates

Jack London's adventures with his publishers would make a record stranger than any fiction he has written. London has not yet given us a real pirate story—the nearest approach to that sort of thriller is "The Sea Wolf" and his own experiences as an oyster pirate in San Francisco bay; mere personal reminiscences of the poaching industry almost commonplace in comparison with the real thing. Piracy is no longer on the high seas; all the pirates have come ashore and are devoting their energies and their nefarious talents to plain robbery within the laws which they have themselves procured. Some of these pirates have engaged in the publishing business and it is with these that Jack London has run afoul. But Jack's practical knowledge of the ways of ordinary pirates at sea whose fate is to pirouette at the end of a yardarm if they are caught, gives him an advantage over other authors and enables him to break even with the piratical crew of the publishing houses. Some day perhaps Jack will write a book entitled "Buccaneers of the Literary Main: Being a True Account of My Capture and Escape While Picarooning for Doubloons on the Trade Track of the Best Sellers."

Outwitting the Buccaneers

When London announced that he was intending to sail around the world in a forty-foot yawl the Pirates were eager to sign for the cruise. London himself was also willing, but he stipulated that he should draw the contract. The Pirates made no demur to this proposition; they had dealt with authors before and they had confidence in their ability to rob any "seller" however shrewd or experienced. They read the London contract and saw nothing but advantage for themselves in its terms. It looked to them as if London had given them everything and reserved nothing for himself. As soon as the contract was signed they began to advertise the fact that this "virile exponent of the elemental and the primitive" would contribute to their special magazines certain phases of the voyage of the Snark—some of them were to publish one thing, some another; one of them would print the log of the voyage, another would describe the places visited, still another would tell of Mr. London's personal adventures, a fourth would receive Mr. London's impressions of men and manners, and so on. But one of the Pirates, reckless of all veracity, announced that Jack London would "write exclusively for the Cosmopolitan." This announcement aroused the ire of the other Pirates, all jealous of their own mercenary interest in this popular writer. They wrote to London and London wrote to the Pirates of the Cosmopolitan, who, as might be expected, took not the slightest notice of Mr. London's protest. Then London called the attention of the Cosmopolitan Pirates to the circumstance that his contract with them entitled them only to "an account of the boat trip, OR fiction." The virtue of that conjunction served as well as the "if" of Touchstone's "catechism." He warned the Pirates that they must not trade on his "exclusive" services, and he insisted that they should advertise their wares explicitly. The Pirates laughed as pirates laugh when their prisoners walk the plank. Whereupon London arose in his wrath and told them that they could "cut out" the "boat trip" and content themselves with fiction in fulfillment of the original contract; he called their attention to the grammatical relation of the conjunction, which he informed them was "an alternative particle" and complementary or correlative to "either." That "fetched" the Pirates, and they ceased to advertise exclusive ownership in the literary product of Jack London; but London is now obdurate, and the Cosmopolitan will publish nothing of the news of the voyage of the Snark. The readers of that piratical publication will, however, enjoy Mr. London's fiction.

All Eyes on Delmas

Now that D. M. Delmas has become a figure of national interest his personality is receiving almost as much attention as that of the young millionaire for whom he has undertaken the task of cheating the gallows. By reason of Delmas's connection with the Thaw case interest in the trial has been intensified in this state. The pride that Californian products always excite in the breasts of Californians finds in the brilliant attorney a worthy object of concern, and consequently there is a great deal of sentiment throughout the state on the side of the defense in the Thaw case. It is a sentiment inspired by the hope that Delmas will live up to the encomiums that have gone on from California; that he will show the self-satisfied Easterners that Californian legal talent is of the highest quality, and compel them to acknowledge that both as an exponent of the law and a spellbinder he is not surpassed by any of the intellectual giants of the metropolis.

They Know His Christian Names

That there has been considerable curiosity in New York respecting the merits and achievements of Delmas is evident from several circumstances. One of them is that the reporters have not been satisfied with the initials of his Christian names. They have been calling him, as though they knew him all their lives, Delphin Michael Delmas. No Californian reporter ever thought of writing more than the initials of his Christian names. Indeed comparatively few men in the state ever knew what Delmas had been christened. The story was told years ago that Barney Murphy, who was a classmate of Delmas at Santa Clara College, did not know his Christian names. Barney went to Sacramento with Bill English once to urge Governor Stoneman to appoint Delmas to a vacancy in the United States Senate. Stoneman promised to do so the following day. That evening it occurred to Murphy and English that it would be necessary to have Delmas's full name written in the commission, and as neither of them knew his full name they sent him a telegram of inquiry. In the morning the slippery Stoneman appointed George Hearst. That was the nearest Delmas ever got to the United States Senate.

The Flaying of Johnson

Annie Laurie has been telling the readers of the Hearst papers of her first acquaintance with Delmas and by anecdotal recital celebrating his genius. Annie is somewhat inaccurate. Or rather she misses the main point of the anecdote. The incident to which she referred occurred in the contest over the Martin will. The attorney Johnson to whom she referred is none other than Hiram of the patriarchal whiskers who is now so busy making laws and improving each shining hour at Sacramento. When Johnson invoked the aid of the deity in that case he did so in the most approved conventional attitude of reverence; on his knees with hands and whiskers raised in supplication and eloquent tears coursing in copious streams carpetwards. This theatrical stant was unquestionably very effective. Johnson like William Pitt has great faith in the virtue of theatrics. If Pitt reminded his contemporaries of Garriek, Johnson should remind his of Frederick Warde. Johnson can weep a torrent without the aid of an onion. His tears submerged the jury in the Martin case. They floundered in a paroxysm of emotion. Delmas fell ill and three whole days passed before he recovered. It was shrewdly suspected that his illness was protracted through sympathy for the jury; that he wished to give them time to recover. When he finally came into court he was in fine fettle physically and oratorically. He plunged into a discussion of the evidence and with the consummate skill of the subtle logician marshaled the inconsistencies and implausibilities of his adversary's case, after which he took some of Johnson's detached expressions and made of them a text for lively ridicule and solemn reprehension. The weeping stunt was dealt with in a way that caused Johnson to wince. For every tear that he shed a bolt of caustic irony was shot into his hide and the jury enjoyed his discomfiture and gave Delmas the verdict.

An Alleged Treaty

After that experience Johnson was as mad as two wet hens, and he told the reporters that Delmas had not played fair inasmuch as he had broken a treaty of peace. He explained that they entered into an agreement before the trial to refrain from personal assaults, and that Delmas took advantage of him having the last word. Nobody asked Delmas for his side of the story. It was assumed that the agreement referred only to personalities of a private nature, and that as Johnson had injected his personality into the case Delmas was at liberty to comment on it. However Johnson affirmed his intention to "get even," but history does not record such an achievement. There are many San Francisco attorneys eager to revenge themselves on Delmas, for he has made some of the most ponderous and the haughtiest of them look like inflated pigmies. He has made it a practice never to go outside the record of the case in his reprehension of professional conduct, but his adversaries in their blind rage have not been content to show equal deference to the ethics of practice. However they have never been able to disconcert him. Once upon a time George Knight was all prepared for an attack on Delmas in a case that was tried in San Jose. He promised to wire his friends in this city of the date set for the argument, but he disappointed them; or rather the court disappointed them. Delmas moved for a non-suit and convinced the court that he was entitled to it.

They Couldn't Stay Put

The wonderful magic of Delmas's eloquence was exemplified in the case of Jarman vs. Rea tried in San Jose. The suit was for damages for slander and the jury was composed of personal friends of the defendant. So warm a friend of the defendant was one of the jurors that after the impanelment he telephoned to Rea to assure him that everything was all right. Much to Rea's astonishment the plaintiff won the case. When Rea met the juror who had assured him everything was all right he demanded to know why he had deceived him. The juror was full of apology. "We couldn't help it," he said. "Everything was all right until Delmas began talking. When he compared you to Boss Tweed 'who perished in a dungeon amid the curses of a state which he had plundered, of a nation which he had disgraced and of mankind whom he had dishonored,' it was all off. We couldn't stay put!"

is called to the fact that Harriman's engines are helping the Western Pacific across the Nevada sands with private surveys and the gift of suitable rights of way they smile mysteriously and say, "Another Harriman trap. Wait till the game is ended. Hasn't Harriman just broken into Jim Hill's territory on Puget Sound after the bitterest kind of fight, and the two were like brothers at the time of the colossal pool on the Northern Securities?"

Beginning of the Feud

Gould's hatred of Harriman dates back to one of the incidents following the train of the latter's acquirement of the Southern Pacific system. Indeed one wing of Harriman's most bitter and most implacable enemies was born out of that famous deal. Harriman had acquired the Union Pacific, the Kansas City Southern and the Chicago and Alton when along about 1900 he cast his eyes on the Central Pacific as a complement to his Union Pacific. The little Napoleon of Railroads had started on his career of piling up properties, according to the testimony brought out before the recent hearing of the Interstate Commerce Commission, by securing control of one road, mortgaging it to the top notch and thereby raising money to buy the next road; then mortgaging that road and raising funds where-with to purchase the next one. Harriman was in the midst of these machinations when Huntington suddenly died and changed the whole field of opportunity. The man that Harriman had now to reckon with was Edwin Hawley, one of the most brilliant of Huntington's advisers and the one who practically had charge of the fate of the S. P. system. Speyer & Co. had been Huntington's bankers and had carried through the settlement of the Central Pacific with the Government. This firm stoutly opposed Harriman's efforts to capture the stock. But Hawley was won over on certain promises, the ill keeping of which now seem fated to break the careers of several magnates in the railroad world.

Hawley on Harriman's Trail

Harriman, as is characteristic, promptly showed his hand once he had taken command of the S. P. system. Mr. Hawley was to have had an important voice in the matter of the reorganization. He was ignored. A violent protest followed and he was at last given a paper place on the executive committee; it proved a dummy position as far as his being allowed to take part in the confidential conferences of the committee. Forthwith Hawley began to study Harriman and his methods. After being ignored as an S. P. director for something like two years he decided one day to buy a big holding of Chicago & Alton. Armed with his stock he asked Harriman for a seat in the directors' board of that railroad—he was on the Harriman trail. Harriman gave the promise, but when Hawley appeared he discovered that the place had been given to John Stillman, a "friend in need" of Harriman's. Hawley is courageous, a hard fighter and a man of infinite resource. Forthwith he sent Harriman his resignation from the S. P. directorate in a form, it is said, to have blistered everything with which it came in contact.

Enter the Western Pacific Race

Hawley rapidly formed around him a coalition of big men who have worried Harriman at every opportunity. From the date of Hawley's resignation may be said to begin the active campaign for the building of the now approaching Western Pacific, a line which practically parallels the C. P. Hawley talked Gould into the venture and both men became directors in the new road. When Harriman heard that Gould had become identified with the line he at once ordered his expulsion from the directorate of the U. P. Out of the same door went W. S. Pierce and all Gould's friends, and they went vowing vengeance against Harriman. They were a shrewd and vigorous band of relentless hatchmen. On their first foray they captured the Chicago & Alton from Harriman.

Cutting Out His Railroads

They formed a combination with the Rock Island crowd, a gentlemanly coterie of railroad magnates that the wise let carefully alone, a combination that bitterly hates Harriman for his attempts to cut up their territory. On a Wall street raid the new aggregation neatly cut Harriman out of his control of the Kansas City Southern. Latterly they have been giving Gould some very keen advice as to the best way to prick Harriman in his western weak spots. Hawley is a man eminently fitted to tell him all about the inside business secrets of the S. P., and outside of Harriman there is no better manipulator of railroad securities on Wall street than W. H. Moore, the king-pin of the Rock Island crowd. With them now is Hill, who will never forgive Harriman's recent invasion of his exclusive northwest territory. Verily it is a battle of giants, for with Harriman are W. K. Vanderbilt, James Stillman, Jacob Schiff and Henry C. Frick, past masters of the game on Wall street.

More Indictments to Come

Many of the grafters have been living in a fool's paradise during the last few weeks. Because the Grand Jury has been compelled to sit less frequently of late owing to Frank Heney's business in court, the gentry who showed ashen complexions and sickly smiles during the earlier sessions of the local inquisition are now beaming happiness and content along the paths of the tenderloin. They freely tell you that the worst is over, that Heney has shot his bolt and that there is no reason now why anybody should worry, with the exception of course of the few unfortunates who have been indicted. With no disposition to inflict unnecessary pain or to dash the cup of joy prematurely from the lips of these fond boasters, I still must tell them that the worst is not over, that Heney has a few more bolts to fit to his trusty cross-bow and further, that a few of his bolts have not yet struck the marks they were aimed at. In plain English, the Grand Jury has not yet finished with its work of finding indictments and besides, it has some true bills on its secret file which have not been presented in court and will not be until all its labors are over. I have this from Grand Juror Sanborn who makes no bones about saying that much. "We have a number of indictments on our secret files," he told me; "not a great many yet"—there was great significance in his way of uttering that "yet"—"but we are not through by any means." So it is really a little too early for the grafters to be putting tongue in cheek when the name of Heney is mentioned. There will be another sheaf of indictments to demur to before very long.

Police Court Justice

When Superior Judge Hebbard startled this community recently by his sweeping criticism of the judiciary, he did not refer specifically to our police judges, but no doubt he intended that they should consider themselves included with their brethren of the higher bench in the charges of incompetence and corruption which he made against all the local ministers of justice without exception. Many are loath to admit that justification exists for his unqualified condemnation of our superior judges. But in so far as Judge Hebbard's strictures of incompetency and corruption were meant to apply to our police tribunals, they have received the unanimous approval of men who know. Those who are compelled to spend a good part of their time in the police courts of this city—lawyers, newspapermen and others—are so used to seeing justice debauched that the spectacle has pretty nearly lost the power to shock them. Only occasionally when the laws are glaringly perverted or brazenly disregarded does it occur to them to consider the real character of the men who have received a great trust only to betray it. It is notorious that certain favored persons can fix a case in one or two of the police courts provided the bright light of publicity does not beat upon it too fiercely. Yet this fact is more often made the subject of careless pleasantries than of serious animadversion; and the men who can be "reached" are returned to the police bench election after election. Perhaps it is not so generally known that attorneys whose practice is mostly in the higher courts plead before our police judges with the greatest reluctance. The reason is not difficult to find; they have small expectation of an impartial administration of justice when they find themselves opposed by the police court practitioners who are allowed to do everything except call the judge by his first name and slap him on the back. These attorneys are agreed that if there is incompetence and corruption to be found in the superior courts it is due as much to the elevation of police judges to the higher tribunal as to any other factor; some carry their methods with them.

Blamed for Social Evil

To give ear to a policeman when he criticizes the police courts may seem akin to the unwisdom of hearkening seriously when the pot calls the kettle black, but it must be remembered that few have better opportunities of seeing the inner workings of these malodorous temples of injustice than the patrolmen who go there every day to testify against the unfortunates whom they have arrested. The police are never disposed to shoulder responsibility for the prevalence of crime, but when they shift part of the burden to the backs of the police judges they are not overstepping the bounds of plausibility, to say the least. Police Captain Mooney has just done this. His district embraces most of the new tenderloin and he has been making excuses for his failure to root out the social evil from the residence district. "The police judges," he complains, "will not assist us. They continually discharge women and men when the evidence of their guilt is clear. These persons are daily sent back to us from the police courts without having been given any sort of punishment. We re-arrest them and they are again turned loose on the community when they reach the police courts. In one instance we succeeded in securing the conviction of seven women on the charge of vagrancy. That occurred in Judge Shortall's court on January 15. Those women have not been sentenced by Judge Shortall and we have received no assurance that they ever will be sentenced. In the meantime the women are in the same condition of vice as when arrested and adding to the sum of our troubles." That is a plain statement of what has been happening in the police courts for years. The truth of the matter is that the women of the underworld are able to bring such strong influence to bear upon the police judges that those functionaries who subordinate law to politics lack the courage to punish them. The only time that they are constrained to screw their moral bravery to the sticking place of passing adequate sentence is when the newspapers direct public attention to their actions so insistently that they are compelled to choose between the displeasure of the influential person who has been haled before them and the castigation of a paper read by thousands of voters. In such a dilemma justice is usually done.

How Justice Is Dealt Out

Indeed, if our police judges had half the respect for law that they exhibit for the power of the press, there would be little cause for complaint. The newspapers are supposed to represent public opinion and the police judges study them carefully, so that when occasion arises, they may give the public what they think the public wants. An instance of this sort occurred in Judge Conlan's court a few days ago. A boy of seventeen was arrested on the complaint of a girl whom he had molested on her way home from work. It appears that he followed her closely for several blocks and finally placed his hand on her arm as she entered the gate to her home. After being well drubbed by the young woman's brother the boy was arrested and charged with battery and disturbing the peace. The papers "played up the story" and the girl was represented as a heroine who had had the courage to give one of the despicable breed of mashers his just deserts. It was intimated that Judge Conlan would set a precedent that would enable young women to walk the streets without being insulted. The hint was not lost on Judge Conlan for he sentenced the boy to nine months in the County Jail. Now there is no disposition here to minimize the evil of mashing; it is a cowardly practice, all too prevalent on our streets, from which young women ought to be protected. But the point is that this boy was not a masher at all in the ordinary sense of that term, but only a half-witted fellow for whom the sound beating he received would have been punishment enough. This fact the judge knew when he sentenced him for the lad's attorney informed the court that the boy was on the verge of idiocy, that one of the probation officers of the juvenile court would so testify and that to send him to jail instead of to the reform school would simply result in the destruction of the little brains he possessed. In spite of all this Judge Conlan refused to hear the probation officer's testimony and gave the boy nine months in jail besides delivering a homily (which the newspapers duly recorded) on the evils of mashing and the necessity of safeguarding the young women of the community. Here was an occasion when a police judge might have performed one of those well-considered acts which have made Judge Ben Lindsey of Denver's Juvenile Court famous and well-beloved. But any ethical striving seems beyond the capacity of the police courts of this city and besides, the lad was ragged and dirty—clearly no votes would be lost by sending him to jail.

Historian, Townsend

"Our Constitution," a history of the inception and development of the supreme law of the land, is too ponderous a work to have anything connected with it of a frivolous nature. Therefore the author scorns the familiar abbreviation of his christian name, and defies recognition as the creator of that vulgar but popular series of sketches dealing with the adventures of "Chimmie Fadden." These sketches made "Ned" Townsend famous. Perhaps "Our Constitution" will bring equal fame to Edward Waterman Townsend. Those of us who knew "Ned" Townsend as a reporter in this city should be less surprised to learn that he devoted many years to the gathering of material for a history of the Constitution, than we were when he created Chimmie Fadden. For "Ned" Townsend was a young man of considerable dignity and not of a temperament that was likely to find relaxation in the study of characters representative of the submerged tenth. So many years have elapsed since the author of Chimmie Fadden deserted San Francisco to begin his career in the country's literary center that he is now remembered only by the old-timers of journalism. Only to a small number of the residents of new San Francisco is he known as one of the first of the Californians that "made good" in the East. Yet "Ned" Townsend was a veteran reporter in this city in the late eighties. He was a star newsgatherer on the Call staff when Will Hearst came from Boston to take charge of the Examiner. Townsend was one of the first of the clever journalists that were lured to the Examiner staff.

His First Notable Achievement

He began his newspaper career as the general utility of a Virginia City (Nev.) newspaper, not, however, the famous Enterprise from which has issued so many geniuses. As the story goes, he was about the only one connected with the sheet who had wit enough to keep sober, and it was owing to the bibulous tendencies of the rest that he got his chance. There was an outbreak of the convicts in the Carson State Prison during which several of the guards were killed and the militia was called on to suppress the disorder. When the news came neither the reporter nor the proprietor was in condition to distinguish between a hail storm and a fusillade of rifles. It was late at night when he returned to find the foreman in a blue fury, and with no outlook but the expectation of having to hash something together from the reports in the other paper. "Not necessary," was the assurance of the youngster; "I have all the facts and will write you a good story." After some picturesquely profane objections to "having that stuff you will write put into type," the foreman was finally persuaded, with the aid of a liberal supply of beer, to give the thing a trial. Next morning, when the proprietor and reporter were awakened from their nap and put outdoors, it occurred to them that their last recollections were of important news to be gathered and that the paper would not have even so much as a line of reference to it. While they were ruefully repenting their debauch a carrier threw a copy into the doorway. They picked it up and spread it open and there, on the first page, was a complete account illustrated by diagrams. The credit was given to the foreman, but he was honest and placed it where it belonged. Though the mention of Townsend's name always produces the reflex "Chimmie Fadden," there are old-timers who have not yet forgotten "Major Max," and his letters published in the Call. According to his own story, the most strenuous days of his life were those spent in San Francisco, when, in addition to his regular work as a reporter, he was doing special writing, and taking an active part in the management of several clubs. "There was a period," he says, "when I must have lived chiefly on coffee and hard work." He was an exception in the time when "gin and journalism" were coupled as a matter of course, and most of the contemporary "good fellows," who needed to be put through a sobering process before they were in condition for serious work have passed away and been forgotten while Townsend still appears, to the imagination of those who know him only through his writings, as one of the young men of the day.

Art Redivivus

A happy sign of the time is the rebuilding of the Mark Hopkins Art Institute. The arts and luxuries only venture an approach when the industries are assured a plethora of tribute. In this case the mercantile element in the Association might not have ventured the reconstruction on such an elaborate scale as proposed had not the Board of Regents of the State University, suddenly awakened to the very important factor the Association cuts in the local art world, promised to furnish a handsome share in the expense. Without the Art Association as a nucleus around which the local artists may cluster with their various hopes, ideas and canvasses, San Francisco is a city void and unrepresented as far as art is concerned. the state has done more to foster and stimulate those noble aspirations. ### Lepers of High Society

My Hawaiian correspondent writes: "A rumor comes from Japan that the Japanese government intends to adopt a system for the segregation of its lepers. In every other country this rumor reaches it will interest scientists. Here it interests society. There is quite a colony of Hawaiians in Japan, many of whom left here to avoid the segregation law that would have sent them to Molokai. For the most part they are men and women who in Hawaii were of good social position, some of them of wealth. When they or their family physicians discovered the incipient signs of the dread leprosy, they quietly left for Japan. In some cases the local health authorities winked at their departure, or even suggested it. Molokai is very comfortable. The lepers are taken care of there as they are in no other leper settlement but they are imprisoned for life on a lovely island and the terror of that fate appals the stoutest heart. Going to Japan was looked on as exile, but it was neither isolation nor imprisonment for life. In the earlier stages of the disease, it meant simply carefulness on the part of the afflicted, without either separation from human kind or any other of the miseries of Molokai, and strange to say Hawaiian lepers that left here in the incipient stages of the disease have in most cases, by careful living and regulation treatment effaced in a measure the ravages of the disease. There are a number of cases which, except to bacteriological tests, seem entirely cured. To all these, and to their friends and families here, the rumor of segregation has something sinister in it. It is the very thing from which they fled when they went to Japan.

Athletic Tournaments at Coronado

Many athletic events are scheduled for Coronado this winter under the auspices of the Coronado Country Club. The golf programme for this month includes a championship tournament for men. A duplicate of the challenge trophy will be given to the winner. The challenge trophy must be won three times in order to become the property of the winner. The second prize is a silver medal. On the 11th there will be a championship tournament for women, on the 18th a driving contest for men and on the 25th a driving contest for women. The annual tennis tournament will take place on the 14th, 15th and 16th of this month. The Misses May and Florence Sutton will be at Coronado for the tournament, and as the ships of the Pacific Squadron are expected in San Diego harbor, many naval officers will doubtless participate. The much-talked-of polo tournament and race meeting, to be held under the auspices of the Southern California Polo and Pony Racing Association, will commence on March 2d.

CHASE'S NEW PAVILION

When Fred H. Chase began the erection of his new sales pavilion at 478 Valencia street, after the fire, he had many things to overcome, but finally got started and put up his box-stalls, which are the best ever built in this city. For the first few sales held during this fall and winter he was compelled to use a large tent in which to show and auction the horses, and the rains and winds, which seem to have visited us this year in greater force than usual, played havoc with his canvas on two or three occasions. Recently, however, a force of carpenters have been at work putting up the new permanent pavilion, and when the Combination Sale comes off on Monday night, February 11, it will be held under the roof of this new building, and even should the rain fall in torrents, spectators and horses will be housed comfortably from the storm and can defy the elements. The new pavilion will be very large, roomy in every way, brilliantly lighted and comfortably seated. Horses can be shown at speed either in harness or to halter, there being a straight track nearly 200 feet long to show them on. Mr. Chase now has the only place in the city where high-class auction horses can be stabled and shown in all kinds of weather.

THE BAYWOOD STUD, SAN MATEO, CONSIGNMENT, THE STAR LOT OF THE SALE

Don't fail to go a day or two before the sale of February 11th and inspect the consignment of horses sent up from the Baywood Stud at San Mateo. These horses were bred at Llano Seco Rancho, in Butte county, and especially fitted and prepared for this sale at Baywood Stud, where, as all Californians know, horses are educated and mannered—not "broke." These horses are all accustomed to steam and electric cars, automobiles and other infernal inventions, and range from four to six years in age. They will come direct from the breeder's stables to this sale. There are in the consignment carriage horses, pairs, surrey or buggy horses, single horses for business buggies and some light draft horses that are extra nice ones. Send to Fred H. Chase for a catalogue of this sale. If you want any kind of a horse weighing less than 1,500 pounds there will be something at this sale to suit you.

Reinforced Concrete

By Charles F. Whittlesey.

The accompanying picture is of the Pacific Building, which is being erected at Fourth and Market streets.

In the reconstruction of San Francisco this is the largest reinforced concrete building which has yet been announced. It will be erected on the site of the old Flood Building, and will have a frontage on Market street of 195 feet with a side elevation of 145 feet on Fourth street. It will be nine stories high and contain five hundred and forty offices, with five stores on the ground floor, all facing on Market street. The exterior of the building for the first two stories will be veneered with ceramic tile in rich browns. Above the second story the entire front will be faced with dull glazed restricted by the city ordinances, which is one hundred and two feet. The first story will have a height of twenty feet; the second, twelve feet, and the remaining stories ten feet each. An ingenious arrangement of the structure and the fact that the roof will be of concrete makes it possible to dispense entirely with an attic story.

The building is being erected for the Pacific Company, who have obtained a fifty years lease, and will cost when completed one million dollars.

The equipment provided for rushing this work is worthy of mention. All the sand, stone and cement come to the building in wagons which are dumped tile in a soft gray green, with trimmings in cream colored glazed terra cotta in rich detail. The corridors and lobbies will be finished in imported marbles, and six high-speed electric elevators will be installed.

The building will have a complete heating, lighting and power plant sufficient to provide for the needs of all the neighboring buildings. The stores and offices will all be trimmed in mahogany. An up-to-date law library will also be installed in the building for the benefit of attorneys.

One remarkable feature of this concrete structure as pointed out by the architect, Chas. F. Whittlesey, is the fact that nine stories are made possible, within the limit of height to which concrete buildings are into the basement through the sidewalk and thereafter are handled automatically until they reach their permanent place in the construction of the building. A tram railroad makes the circuit of the building gathering up the sand, stone and cement in the proper proportion and quantity, which are run up an incline and dumped into a hopper which in turn dumps into the mixing machine, and from there into the hoist which dumps into the conveyors on the floors above, which dump the finished concrete in the position it is to occupy in the finished building. This building will be completed and ready for occupancy not later than September of this year and the basement, first and second stories will be completed and occupied in June.

Social Prattle

By Tantalus

He Will Be Missed

Mrs. Eleanor Martin will probably be inconsolable over the departure of her dear friend Count de la Rocca. The Count was about the only person in society who could keep pace with Mrs. Martin's social activities. Debutantes wilted in the race, seasoned belles got out of tune, the younger matrons cultivated crow's feet, the dowagers dropped by the wayside, but Mrs. Eleanor Martin still goes the dizzy round as blithely as though grandmotherhood were synonymous with youth. And Count de la Rocca was her man Friday—he could always be depended on to give the rich flavor of Gaelic wit to her dinner parties; he did not lightly regard the arts and elegances of afternoon tea; and unlike most foreigners he could actually "reverse" his partner at a dance! So no wonder his social worth was rated above Bradstreet. Pleasure was business with Count de la Rocca and as there are few Californian men who have his instincts and training it will be hard to find a plug for the hole which his departure has made in society.

His Parisian Pull

The Count's cousin, M. de Soisset, has decided to send his daughter to France, where she will enjoy the hospitality of the de la Rocca family. Madeline Jeanne de Soisset has not been formally introduced into society here, but she has been a guest at several of Mrs. Martin's entertainments and is a very fascinating girl. Her family prefer that she should make a European alliance; hence the debut abroad instead of here. Count de la Rocca will probably prove very useful to the Peter Martins who are living in Paris. His mother the Comtesse de Perreti de la Rocca has the key to the Fauborg Saint Germain, which holy of holies Americans seldom glimpse. If the Comtesse choose she can give Mrs. Peter a peep at that branch of French society which remains proof against the invasion of American dollars.

He's an Art Connoisseur

I hear that it is through Mrs. Will Crocker's influence that Lieutenant Clarence Corrigan is going to give up the army to enter the collectors' field. Ever since his marriage to Anna Sperry, Mrs. Crocker's niece, Lieutenant Corrigan has helped Mrs. Crocker add to her collection of art treasures and his judgment is so sure in things artistic that Mrs. Crocker thought him out of joint with brass-button environment.

Generous Matrons

Mrs. Will Crocker and Mrs. Frank Carolan are probably more generous to their friends and relatives than any other wealthy women in the smart set. Every time Mrs. Crocker returns from Europe she brings trunk loads for especial favorites. When Harriet Pullman married Francis Carolan her trousseau was the wonder of Chicago and although she has been married for years there are boxes of trousseau linens that have not yet been touched. Mrs. Pullman had twenty dozen of every article made for her daughter and Mrs. Carolan has given away whole outfits from this collection without making a serious impression in the quantity. When her sister-in-law, Miss Carolan, married she gave her a dozen of each and Miss Kirk who married under Mrs. Carolan's chaperonage was also treated to a generous lot of Mrs. Carolan's bridal outfit.

It's No Longer Vulgar

The fad for wearing earrings has now reached the stage where the old rule, that all jewelry is "bad form" in the morning, is broken by those who love the ear baubles. Baroness von Schroeder wears her huge pearl pendants shopping in the forenoon. Mrs. Gus Taylor and her sisters wear earrings even with the short walking togs and so does Mrs. Jim Follis. Pearls are the favorite stones for the ear, but ever since the last Greenway dance the knowing ones are suspicious about the value of some of these pearls. A woman whose pearls have been the envy of her set lost an earring during the dance. It was found uninjured in a corner of the room but the gallant who picked it up squeezed it too hard and the "pearl," which was simply a clever Roman imitation, crumbled off, leaving what looked like a nice little piece of castile soap underneath.

Among the prominent guests at the Hotel Green in Pasadena this year is Major Theodore Kane Gibbs of Newport. He is a representative of the Astor family.

Murphy is Playing Golf

Samuel G. Murphy, the retired President of the First National Bank, who was thrown into a state of panic by the April earthquake, is at Del Monte feeling like a three-year-old. He has entirely recovered his composure and has taken to golf. He doesn't play a very fast game, but he has good staying qualities.

A Generous Tipster

The waiters, the bell boys, in fact, all those who fetch and carry at Del Monte are doing so with the utmost alacrity these days. The way the good Gold-field dollars fly out of the pockets of a certain wealthy visitor keeps employes hustling to get there first. There have been several very lavish tippers at Del Monte this winter, but the story I heard of a Pullman episode puts this one at the head of his class. On the way down here he placed a roll of bills, amounting to seven or eight hundred dollars, under his pillow. He forgot all about it till the next morning as he was starting for the dining car. "Dearie," he said to his wife as she turned back to get something she had forgotten. "I think I left some money in my berth. Would you mind looking?" When she returned she handed him five hundred dollars, saying "It was scattered about; was that all?" "There was more than that," her husband responded; "but no, dearie, you must not go back to look again! The porters have been awfully good to us, and some of them will find the rest and no doubt can make use of it." With this affluent gentleman and his family is their physician who receives, so rumor goes, a hundred dollars a day for running off from his less favored patients to travel about luxuriously, and be on hand should accident or pain befall any of this household. Del Monte is to be favored for some time, as this lucky mine owner is delighted with Monterey and thinks he will be slow about leaving it. "You can breathe here," he said, "throw your arms out and smoke your cigar without being afraid of its fumes getting in anybody's face. I like it and think the place good headquarters for my family."

The A. B. Costigans received a visit from the stork last week and are now rejoicing in the possession of a baby boy.

Mr. W. B. Sanborn was the host at a very enjoyable dinner last Friday night at "The Severn" in honor of Miss Jane Wilshire and Mr. Jack Polhemus.

Why the Automobile Show Will Be of General Interest

By Homer Boushey, Chairman of Show Committee

Unquestionably the American people have a greater knowledge of the production, distribution and consumption of its products than any other class of people. They are in closer touch with the commercial development of the nation and endeavor to keep posted on the progress made in manufactured articles.

The automobile forms a most absorbing topic for observation and study as its progress has been so rapid. Twelve years ago there were no automobile factories in the United States making machines for the market. Today there are over 150 manufacturers of motor cars and new factories are being added almost every week. Each factory is behind in its orders and many of them have already sold the cars they will make in 1908. In 1895 there were a few machine shops working on automobile models hoping to produce a machine that would be practical. Today there is invested in this country in automobile-building the vast sum of $67,000,000, while the valuation of the product from the industry is about $275,000,000.

This is one of the most unusual conditions in the world of commerce. It is doubtful if there has ever been a parallel. The condition has been brought about through the utility of the motor car in its adaptation to various forms of transportation. And it has been said that in this respect the automobile is in its infancy.

Let us enumerate some of the uses to which the automobile has been put and we can see what a factor it is in superceding other methods of transportation.

The touring car is the most popular of all automobiles. This is due to public demand and the efforts of the manufacturers in concentrating their energies on this type of machine. The touring car is the pleasure machine, but it has proven its practicability in emergencies. What would we have done in San Francisco during those trying April days of almost a year ago without the automobile? The touring car brings country close to the city; it brings the beauties of nature within reach of people who heretofore were largely confined to city life. It has brought up the price of suburban real estate by bringing it within a few minutes distance from a large city. It has been a factor in the demand for good roads.

The runabout is the typical business man's car. It enables him to make twenty calls where he used to make but five with a horse-drawn vehicle. It has been instrumental in the centralization of retail business by the expansion of its zone.

The limousine and landaulet are supplanting cabs, coupes, hansoms and carriages both for public and private use.

The numerous other types of motor-driven vehicles depend largely upon the peculiarity of the business.

We see the automobile in daily use by the fire department. No field of municipal service offers such advantages for the motor car. The motor wagon has three times the speed of horses. It reaches the fire more quickly and losses are thus diminished.

The police are using motor wagons in the large Eastern cities and in only a short time it will be universally used by the authorities in all cities.

The use of automobiles for the rural free delivery of the Post Office department is gradually increasing. Again speed is a factor. The mail is delivered earlier.

Newspapers find the automobile a necessity in circulating their papers quickly over a wide territory.

Many papers which formerly depended upon railways now use automobiles and deliver their issues in the morning fifty miles distant before the first railway train leaves the city.

In Paris the motor omnibus is a common sight, likewise in London. That such will be the case in our American cities within the near future is a foregone conclusion.

Hospitals find the automobile an ideal ambulance, both for speed and comfort. The adoption of the auto for this purpose is a daily occurrence in our larger cities.

The motor truck is now a very common sight and its practicability is established. Of course many are propelled by storage batteries, but they are classed as motor-driven vehicles in summarizing the uses of the automobile.

The army has given the motor car a most severe test and has reported favorably. France has even gone so far as to equip the machines with rapid firing guns. The American army now has the project under consideration and the adoption of the auto is practically assured.

There is no question but that old traditions are losing prestige under the advance of the automobile. Motor-driven vehicles are being used in some communities as hearses. It is difficult to imagine to what use the auto will not be put in this swift-moving age when we accomplish in minutes what our grandfathers did in hours.

Self-propelled fire-engines, chemical wagons, sprinkling carts, repair-wagons for trolley lines are only a few of the many vehicles that have been tested and have proven adequate for the purpose.

Father Time has been lessening and lessening the hours required for a given task. Time-devouring inventions have played an important part. And the automobile has been one of the chief factors.

The automobile is part and parcel of our American life. Its achievements have only just begun. What the future holds in store can hardly be estimated. Look what has been accomplished in the short time of twelve years in supplanting the horse, steam and electricity.

An automobile show such as will be held at the Coliseum on February 18th to 25th should be of interest to every man who prides himself on a knowledge of American industries. That the show will prove of value is assured, not only in appealing to the motor enthusiast, but in educating the layman to an appreciation of what the automobile has done and is doing for civilization.

The Committee is arranging its plans so that the show will afford a means of disseminating knowledge regarding the automobile as well as affording pleasure to the visitor.

THE EFFECT OF EDUCATION

"Don't you think that education has a tendency to reduce the volumes of crime in the world?" the university professor asked.

"No," said the Cynic. "I think it tends to reduce the number of convictions in our criminal courts."

Goldsmith's Comedy

It is a great pleasure to predict that the performance at the Greek Theatre next Tuesday afternoon will transcend the usual, and yet the prospect, so far as I am aware, has occasioned not the slightest ripple of enthusiasm. Have we grown so blasé, so accustomed to seeing the usual transcended at the Greek Theatre as to be inclined to view with polite complacency the making of history within the confines of that classic temple? It doth seem so. And yet it is not improbable that our apathetic contemplation of coming events of great significance betrays our inability to appreciate their intrinsic value. If the intrusion of a merely personal view may be pardoned I will suggest that even the distinguished promoters of culture under whose benign auspices history is being made at the Greek Theatre are not wholly conscious of the place which that institution has come to occupy in the higher artistic circles of this continent; that it has not yet occurred to them that the atmosphere of it is alluring to great artists who are eager to have their names shrined in its traditions, and therefore that it should be their aim to safeguard it from the cheapening influence of mediocrities whose serious acceptance argues a provincial and uneducated taste. No professional artists should be admitted to the stage of the Greek Theatre save those of the highest rank. All of which is by way of preface to discussion of the coming of a troupe of genuine histrionic artists to breathe life into the characters of Oliver Goldsmith's delightful comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer." To what we are indebted for the sending of these high priced players to this Coast at a time when the metropolis affords them no opening. I am at a loss to divine, though I half suspect them of appreciating the privilege of appearing at the Greek Theatre and requiring no coaxing. The company is composed of men and women of rare talent: William H. Crane, who heads the cast with Miss Ellis Jeffreys, is one of the veteran stars of America, and Miss Jeffreys is an English actress of the first rank. Then there is George Gidden, a famous London actor, Margaret Dale, who used to be John Drew's leading lady, and Fanny Addison Pitt and Walter Hale, long identified with the Frohman forces. What a treat these trained mimes should give us in that rollicking old Goldsmith comedy that long since became one of the classics of the English drama and is therefore but seldom revived! "She Stoops to Conquer" is one of the much neglected classics with an interesting history and I welcome the pretext for advertizing to it, so rich is it in memories of the Mitre Tavern and the galaxy of literary talent that worshiped at the feet of Boswell's idol. That history abounds in incidents out of which might be woven the scenario of a drama compact with human interest. It is the history of one of the most pathetic experiences of Goldsmith's career, for when the play was written the author was heavily in debt, and hoped, by the sale of it, to realize sufficient to satisfy his creditors. But he encountered the jealousy of rivals and the enmity of the manager of Covent Garden to whom he wrote: "For God's sake take the play and let us make the best of it, and let me have the same measure at least which you have given as bad plays as mine." His manuscript after being held at the theatre for more than a year was returned to him with numerous disparaging notes written on the blank sides. It was the insistence of his friend Samuel Johnson that brought about the production of the play, and then under the most adversely prejudicial auspices. The manager scheming to make it a failure refused to purchase scenery or costumes and some of his leading players refused to take the parts to which they had been assigned. David Garrick wrote a sneering prologue for it, half apologetic, in which he facetiously dubbed Goldsmith the physician of the comic muse, the play a potion in fine draughts and the audience the patient that " * * Must his pretensions back, Pronounce him regular or dub him quack."

Wm. H. Crane

Who will be seen in the Goldsmith classic, "She Stoops to Conquer," at the Greek Theatre, Tuesday afternoon, February 12.

And the play succeeded in despite the cabal against it, but Goldsmith was under so great a nervous strain and was so fearful of a hostile reception that he did not attend the performance. Early in the evening Samuel Johnson rounded up all his friends at the Shakespeare Tavern and there tried to revive Goldsmith's spirits with Johnsonian jest and quip but the playwright was in no mood to frolic or to relax into sportiveness. When the dinner was over Johnson and his friends repaired to the theatre resolved to make the play "go." Johnson took a conspicuous box seat and his companions stationed themselves in diverse parts of the house. When Johnson laughed the house rocked with merriment, but these artifices were wholly unnecessary. The play won its way on its own merits, but poor Goldsmith did not learn of its first night's success until the fifth act when a friend who went in search of him and found him in St. James's Park engulfed in melancholy communicated the joyful news.

THEODORE BONNET.

Seats For the Performance

The production of Goldsmith's comedy at the Greek Theatre will be under Will Greenbaum's management. The company will appear at the Macdonough Theatre in Oakland, Tuesday evening and Wednesday matinee and night. Seats for the performance at the Greek Theatre will be on sale this Saturday and Monday at Sherman, Clay & Co., on Van Ness just above California, and Kohler & Chase's, corner of Sutter and Franklin. The prices are $1, $1.50 and $2.00.

The Chopin Opera

The latest novelty of the Lambardi season was the opera "Chopin." The libretto is a compilation of sketchy episodes from the life of the unfortunate Polish composer set to the music of his own creation by Giacomo Orefice, and the experiment is interesting even if not completely satisfying. The music of Chopin considered as abstract music is so supremely beautiful, of such absolute originality and limitless variety of moods that the thematic material for more than one opera is surely abundant and of character to fit any conceivable dramatic situation, but just that dramatic element is what is lacking in the libretto of the work under consideration. The life of many another composer would have furnished sufficient theatrical material for such a purpose, but poor Chopin, with his always delicate physique, his years full of the drudgery of piano teaching, and his long protracted struggle with the disease to which he finally succumbed was perforce relegated to a comparatively uneventful existence from which stirring situations adapted to theatrical treatment were quite missing. Hence the librettist was handicapped at the outset by the entire absence of dramatic plot, and the wonderful inspirations of Chopin seem futile when fitted to inadequate stage climaxes. Then too, it is a question whether Orefice has not been too literal in his translation of the piano harmonies into orchestral music. On the whole we think the work cannot have lasting success owing to the undramatic quality of its plot, but here and there some very fine effects are obtained, notably the swinging Krakowiat and mazurka themes cleverly blended in the opening of the first act, the magnificent storm setting derived from the F minor ballade (erroneously called waltz themes in the program notes), the exquisite love that evolved from the soulful E major Etude. The harrowing scene of the death of the baby Grazia seems an unwarrantable innovation on the part of the librettist, no such episode having any part in Chopin's life, but it at least received a fitting musical setting in the sombre strains of the C minor nocturne with its superb religious chorale, splendidly adapted to the operatic chorus. This was one of Signor Orefice's best efforts and was vociferously redemanded by the audience. Under any circumstances we must feel thankful to the Lambardi singers for the opportunity of hearing another of Haly's operatic novelties.

The Princess Chic

The San Francisco Opera Company is doing "The Princess Chic" at the American this week and doing it with an enthusiasm that is quite infectious. The production is lacking in none of the essentials that contribute to the success of picturesque, sprightly musical comedy. It abounds in color that charms the eye and melodies that tickle the ear. The performers have the vim that is so important in this species of entertainment, and some of them have voices such as are seldom heard in the Broadway companies whose specialty is musical comedy. Aida Hemmi is still the chief vocalist despite the acquisition of Miss Maude Beatty of Australia. And though Miss Hemmi is scarcely to be described as chic so far as form is concerned, she has a voice of fetching quality and knows how to use it and does use it in a manner that moves her audience to warm approval. Miss Beatty is pleasing of person, and as the page makes a very enticing figure. Teddy Webb is the chief fun maker of the cast, and he is most industrious in his efforts to agitate the risibles of his audience. Quite in contrast with his methods are those of George Kunkel. Francis Carrier wins generous applause for his singing and he gets fine support in the accompanying ensemble work which, on the whole, is excellent.

In the Limelight

Victor Herbert's brilliant comic opera, "The Wizard of the Nile," is a great success at Idora and bids well to keep the house full for some weeks to come. "The Serenade," another Herbert gem, will follow.

Rosenthal, the wonderful pianist, will play some of his extraordinary arrangements of Strauss waltzes at his concerts here. The great pianist seems to have a special fondness for the melodies of the "waltz king." His paraphrase on "The Blue Danube" is said to be a marvelous bit of intricate writing.

Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, is touring America, and meeting with great success, often giving joint concerts with his wife, a beautiful young American whom he met when a student at the Conservatory where both were studying. Will Greenbaum is arranging to present them here in April.

"The Half Breed"

Local theatregoers will have an opportunity of seeing the successful Western drama, "The Half Breed," at the Colonial Theatre where it will receive its first presentation in this city, beginning next Monday night. It is a four-act comedy-drama by Harry D. Cottrell and Oliver Morosco. In Los Angeles this drama played to capacity houses for five straight weeks, breaking all previous records in the Southern metropolis. Manager Kurtzig states that "The Half Breed" will be staged in a most elaborate fashion and that an exceptionally strong cast will be used in its production. Dealing with life in Indian Territory, it affords excellent opportunities for stirring situations and beautiful scenery, all of which will receive careful attention at the hands of the management of the popular McAllister street playhouse. The action of the play is laid in Indian Territory. A terrific rain-storm is one of the sensational features.

"Salome," the great one-act tragedy by Oscar Wilde, which is causing so much talk in the East, is announced for an early production at the Colonial.

Commencing Monday night, February 11, "The Dictator" will be put on at Ye Liberty Playhouse in Oakland. This is the popular comedy drama that made a big hit at the Columbia in this city. By request "Old Heidelberg" will soon be revived.

The Beringer Musical Club

A new musical club, composed of eight students of the Beringer Conservatory of Music, has recently been organized, the first meeting taking place last week at the studio of Professor and Mme. Joseph Beringer. The club is to be known as the Beringer Musical Club. Miss Frances Westington of this city was elected President and Miss Helen Hendricks of Berkeley was chosen Secretary and Treasurer. The purpose of the club is to further the interest in music and to give, periodically, public and semi-public recitals. The members are the Misses Sadie Bullman, Viola Jurgens, Grace Sutherland and Agnes Burrell of this city, Miss Emma Blum of San Rafael and Miss Anita Morse of Alameda.

The Flower of Vaudeville

The week beginning this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum will be one of the most fascinatingly eventful in the history of vaudeville. The Lasky Rolfe Quintette, composed of four "cellos" and one string bass will be heard for the first time in this city. The instrumentalists are Herman Brandt, Ethel Murray, Rita Perkins, Charles Frinck and Angelo Falco. The music of this act has been arranged and rehearsed by the famous composer, Victor Herbert. The artists are seated in an immense and daintily colored sea shell which acts as a perfect sounding board and which is brilliantly illuminated by electricity. Nellie Beaumont, a captivating comedienne, with the assistance of

"The Virginian"

The Kirke La Shelle dramatization of Owen Wister's immensely popular best-seller, "The Virginian," a novel that had a long run, will be presented at the Novelty theatre for two weeks, commencing Monday evening with Dustin Farnum in the title role and the same great cast as seen at the Columbia Theatre last season. The play is well-known as an interesting romance of the Western plains—one that takes hold of the sensibilities, charms the eye, thrills the emotions and presents an absolutely truthful picture of its territory. Its types are faithfully copied from the book and transferred to the stage without losing any of the charm which created the enormous demand for Owen Wister's romance. By the way, the man whose individuality inspired Owen Wister in his creation of the hero of his novel was recently married in this city to Katherine Adams, daughter of Edward Adams, editorial writer of the Chronicle.

artistically diversified; its color free and strong—a delightful picture framed by four street fronts and full of an interesting life. Even to-day upon the feast of this particular saint to which it is holy, the square is alive with its picturesque trafficking. No vehicle rattles over the stones; no blatant, bell-beating tram disturbs the ear or eye. At one end of the Piazza appears a column with the winged lion of St. Mark upon its capital, much like that one so well-known at Venice. This lion, said a passer-by, was once destroyed by the French. The French were veritable demons for destruction. At the other end rises a Gothic pillar surmounted by a shrine. Between these two monuments, the market-place, riotous with a blinding burst of sunlight, gleamed like a camp. Huge umbrellas or sunshades, white, yellow or green, were spread above the booths and stands and in their cool shadows sat women, old and young, chaffering with patrons, sitting calmly with folded hands or knitting mechanically amidst the drowsy hum. Old market women, poor widows, unlovely and peasant-like, they sat there, each with a cross to bear, I know, and patient in its bearing. Among these old and weary ones were younger women, too, and girls a-many, like bright-cheeked pippins mixed with wrinkled russet apples. There were many full-flushed and buxom as Maria of the ristorante; perhaps they and even she might some day mumble toothless gums over a pile of fruit in this very Piazza Erbe. Let us hope that Gaetano may not die an untimely death, nor his little business fail him, nor Maria come to this, nor Maria's daughters! Such are the whimsical thoughts that sometimes assail the idle speculation of this wanderer. Away!

Pleasant was it to sit down at a little table in the shade upon the sidewalk before a cafe and drink a cool birra, transported barrel-wise over the Alps from Munich, and pleasant to watch the unhurrying life of the town defile before one—and anon to merge again with the life.

In the Piazza dei Signori I came upon the Palazzo della Ragione, built in 1183 and once the residence of the Scaligers. Hither Dante fled for refuge when banished from Florence and as I passed through the wonderful courtyard with its rare architecture, the ghosts of the great dead seemed very near, for these very stones had felt their hands and feet of flesh. The sun emptied its violent heat upon my head and in the mid-day silence all things seemed ablaze to the eye with a staring unreality like the limelight splendor on a stage. The Palazzo de Censiglio was erected in 1500 after designs by Fra Giocondo, and the monk architect had caused his portrait to be hewn in stone on one of the corner pillars, preservative of his memory. In far-off San Francisco stood certain buildings erected after designs of the contemplative wanderer who now surveyed this ancient work. But there would be no visitors four hundred years from to-day to gaze upon the face or the name of their architect, provided the buildings survived that lapse of time! In the musing upon the evanescence of all material and even mental things, it was in a petty way satisfying to think of those solid concretions of brick, stone, iron or terra-cotta standing bravely in the far-off city of the Golden Gate, creations of hand and eye, outlasting perhaps, the less stable work of the brain and the poetic products of the imagination. For how often does the work of the pencil live beyond that of the pen in this our day! A vain animal is man, compact of mortal dust and weakness, and he would still have the children or the creatures of his fancy or his invention live on beyond his years. I saluted this monk, Fra Giocondo, as a brother and left him in his petrified immortality basking in the light of a sun that would itself perish.

I knew it! Could it be otherwise? An unconscious doubt had been brooding deep down in my subconscious soul, a doubt which I found impossible to disentangle, hold up to the light or decipher. Chancing suddenly upon the Piazza Vittorio Emanuele it was revealed in a flash. It was the indistinct, lurking uncertainty that there might be no Via, no Piazza Vittorio Emanuele in this city! It was that which I had missed. Yet here it was: a fine square confronted by the imposing Roman Amphitheater built by Diocletian in A. D. 290. Along one side of the square, officers from the local garrison sat sipping drinks, ogling women, discussing the amours of their comrades or the latest methods of military murder. The amphitheater is well preserved, the benches and galleries quite intact, due, no doubt, in a great degree to the labors of restoration bestowed upon it by Napoleon—for the French did not always destroy. The great Theodoric once made it his abode long after that day that saw its audience of twenty thousand shouting and crying in applause at the bloody shows of slaughter in the arena far below.

Thence I was led to scenes of gentler association, for, wandering through a side street near the way of the Capuchins, I chanced upon the garden that holds the reputed tomb of Juliet. Ungenuine though it be, yet here delusion has all to gain and denial all to lose. Here Truth shattering Poetry and Romance, would gather only dust. As this stone sarcophagus is said to treasure all that remains of Shakespeare's hapless heroine, so the fiction of the tomb, so long as the fiction be fair, might well be fostered both by the silver-seeking Italian and the sentimental tourist come for a stare. Juliet lived in Verona, for so saith history and it is likely that Juliet also died in Verona and was buried in a tomb, this one or another. It lies in a little arcade of delicate arches with twin columns and about it from both sides the garden advances its masses of palms, laurels and rose-bushes. One might well be satisfied with such a tomb in such a place, though never a pilgrim came to stand in silence before it. Many came that day—of many nationalities. Three English girls, sisters they appeared to be, walked gravely around the tomb and spoke with low, soft voices, then went away with very reverent steps.

There came a dame of France, dark-eyed and heavy-lidded, accompanied by her bearded husband: both were in traveling dress. Though middle-aged they appeared to be newly married, each oppressed, I thought, and haunted even in the freshness of their association with memories of earlier, perhaps unrealized loves. They entered speaking with voluble carelessness and soon departed in silence with some spell upon their souls. Two very young American girls, fashionably attired, and of the sort apparently that so often appears impervious to sentiment, conveyed to their father in tones that quivered with emotion their intense commiseration over poor Juliet's sad destiny. "To think that she is lying here, father, right here before us!" And at the fall of one sympathetic word from the indifferent sire they had wept. Another brisk Americaine was bent only upon obtaining a photograph of the sarcophagus. Several Italian men and women came and some young girls. The girls and women invested the scene with an air of sanctity for most of them uttered some brief prayer as at the shrine of a saint. A German fraulein holding an open, gilt-leaved book of verses, read certain tender touching lines to her companion, a spectacled youth. The lines moved him not, whereupon she, taking a rose from her dress, placed it beside the other votive flowers. A widow came in voluminously heavy weeds and stood silent before the stone, measuring her own grief, perhaps, with that of her lovely sister whose sorrows have set tears flowing through the centuries.

When the sunlight crept from the stone and the keeper of the monastery garden expressed surprise at my protracted stay, I, too, left the loggia. My only offering was the memory of a very juvenile verse written years ago:

When I think no more upon thee,
Lips or eyes of thine forget,
Rose of June, may this hand wither
As it writes—O Juliet!

one of the principal evidences of civilization. Death follows everywhere in the footsteps of life. A protecting Providence has shielded Pickeye up to the present time from the dread destroyer. Let us devoutly pray that it may long continue to guard us. But many of the surrounding camps have not been so fortunate. Numbers of their bravest and strongest have passed through the Valley of the Shadow and are sleeping in obscure graves, on hillsides and in gulches, where all traces of them will soon be lost and forgotten. Affection and humanity call for a common burying-ground, in order to preserve the resting-places of our dead from oblivion, and that friends may adorn them or kindred seek them out in future days. The undertaking is not a great one and the cost will be trifling. I am sure the appeal is one to which the public spirit of Pickeye and the neighboring camps will readily respond."

The suggestion was received with unanimous approval. The necessity of the project was so evident the wonder was that no one had thought of it before.

"I've a rabbit's foot in my pocket that I got out on the range to-day," said Arkansaw. "It's an invincible. I'll just go Double Cross a stack at his game, and turn the winnings into your graveyard pot, Elder Beals."

"Thank you," replied the parson; and Arkansaw stalked over to one of the faro tables.

"But it is proper," resumed Elder Beals, "that we should proceed systematically, it being a public occasion. With your permission, Captain Ryan, I will call a regular town-meeting."

The proprietor of the saloon cordially assented, and, stepping to the door, Elder Beals raised the tin horn to his lips and sent forth into the darkness a succession of blasts that startled the town and made the heavens reverberate.

"You wouldn't be yourself without that horn, it seems to me," said J-B, as Elder Beals re-entered the saloon.

"No, it has become an almost inseparable part of me," replied the parson; and added, with a mirthful twinkle in his eye, "so much so, in fact, that I'm told some sportive persons have hinted I might appropriately be styled a tin-horn preacher."

"Well, anyway, you toot it like old Gabe himself," stammered J-B.

"Thank you for your appreciation. I flatter myself that I've attained to some proficiency with it," complacently acquiesced Elder Beals, affectionately tapping the instrument in question. "It's a necessity of my calling in this new country, where there is no other way of announcing religious services. I call it my portable church-bell, and I find that its peals neither offend the miners nor lessen me in their esteem."

"That's so," assented J-B, seeing a way to extricate himself gracefully; "you're all hunky with the boys, Elder, and can count on their standing in with you on this racket."

It did not take long for the bugle call to produce an effect. When the populace of Pickeye heard the reverend gentleman's trumpet they knew that something of public moment was impending; and on this occasion it was but a few minutes till most of them were converging toward the Long Tom saloon.

The meeting was speedily organized by the election of Elder Beals as chairman, General Houston as secretary and Pap Grimshaw as treasurer. The gambling games had been temporarily closed, the music had ceased, and, in recognition of the changed character of the assembly, Cap Ryan and his assistants came out from behind the bar.

Elder Beals installed himself in the lookout seat of Double Cross's faro table, General Houston occupying the dealer's chair and Pap Grimshaw the case-keeper's. The hundreds in attendance bestowed themselves as best they could, the majority having to stand.

The formalities of organizing and the silence which ensued had impressed the assemblage with a feeling of awe, so that when the meeting was ready to proceed with business it had the solemnity of a devotional gathering. Before the chair could make any announcement, Dobie Joe gravely arose and said:

"Mr. Chairman and boys, it seems to me that it would be right to open this meeting with exercises appropriate to the nature of the business before it. If Elder Beals will pan out a prayer, I'll lead off in a hymn—the 'Old Ship of Zion,' we'll say, for that's my strongest suit."

"The suggestion is a very good one," agreed Elder Beals, rising from the lookout seat; "and in compliance with it, I will offer up a brief supplication."

A reverent spirit seemed to possess the audience, and there was a profound stillness during the prayer. Then, loud and clear as a bugle blast, Dobie Joe's voice rang out in the "Old Ship of Zion," voice after voice joining in the strain till they swelled to the volume of a mighty choir. So enthusiastic were some of the singers that they demanded a repetition, but it was prevented by Elder Beals, who said it would be better to defer more singing until the business of the meeting was concluded. Then he repeated his recent little oratorical flight, with some unimportant variations, and finished by saying he would like to hear the views of others regarding the matter under consideration.

A long pause followed. There was plenty of aside talk, but no one ventured to address the meeting openly. Finally Dobie Joe arose again.

"I hate to be pushing myself forward all the time like a jack-plane," he said, "but as nobody else appears disposed to put his shoulder to the wheel, I may as well buckle to it myself."

"That's right!" "Good boy!" "Go in, Dobie!" and other encouraging exclamations came from different parts of the room.

"I agree," continued Dobie Joe, "with all that Elder Beals has said about civilization and humanity and rescuing things from oblivion. Them's mighty good sentiments, and a man who lives up to them has got about all the stuffing out of the ten commandments that's in them. But Elder Beals doesn't go far enough. Something more than that, it appears to me, is needed for an entirely satisfactory burial. When a man has gone to prospect that undiscovered country from which there's no getting back—if I may sling in a little poetry—I think he should be made to feel that he is still an American citizen reposing in his native soil. What sentiment could be more natural, what feeling more gratifying to a patriotic corpse? The proudest emotion I experience, living, is to behold the Stars and Stripes waving above me. The assurance which would rob death of its terror and render it almost attractive would be that in my long rest that starry banner should still float over me majestically. I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, that a liberty-pole be erected in the center of the Pickeye graveyard, and that the American flag be hoisted on it, perpetually and eternally, in respect and honor of the loyal dead."

A shout of applause shook the building, so affirmative and unanimous that the subsequent adoption of the motion was but a formality. This action appeared to be regarded as disposing of the whole question. It was merely resolved, in addition, that Elder Beals be intrusted with the execution of the project, and then contributions were announced to be in order.

"Here's the rabbit's foot contingent—or certainty, rather, for I told you it was an invincible," said Arkansaw, chucking down a fair-sized bag of gold-dust.

"The Long Tom will always do its part toward encouraging public improvements," said Cap Ryan, laying down a sack of about equal weight.

Purses of less size, nuggets and chispas rapidly accumulated in front of the treasurer, until it was manifest the fund was quite sufficient for the purpose in view. Then Double Cross walked leisurely forward and said, as he cast a sneering look toward Frogmouth Pete:

"I've been waiting to see if any of the fresh tender-foot sports would contribute, but they don't appear to be as liberal with their money as with their tongues. For the honor of the profession I'll ante this," he said, depositing a heavy bag of gold-dust; "but I'm not anxious to get called on it, for I don't like a game in which you must die in order to win out."

"I'll call you right now, you smooth-tongued, white-livered fraud!" cried Frogmouth Pete, casting a sack of gold dust on the table and whipping out his revolver.

The good right hand of Double Cross went instinctively for his gun, but before he could draw it Madame Josephine, with the inspired idiocy of women for handicapping their lovers in a fight, caught his arm, in an endeavor to drag him away. But she paid the penalty. Frogmouth Pete's first shot took effect in Double Cross's breast; the second laid Josephine out stark. Freed from her fatal encumbrance Double Cross succeeded in getting out his pistol, and advanced upon his antagonist. Four or five reports rang out in quick succession, and then it was all over. The three parties to the incidental controversy lay dead upon the floor.

The episode had not lasted twenty seconds. It had come so suddenly and was so quickly ended that the officers and audience had not left their places. And, strange to say, every bullet had gone straight to its mark and lodged there. Not a bystander had been hurt.

"This is a most unfortunate and lamentable affair," remarked Elder Beals, when he had regained his composure.

"Not at all," said General Houston; "it's a good starter for the graveyard, and there are half a dozen others we could afford to throw in."

"I'm at a loss how to proceed in this emergency. Can anyone suggest the proper thing to be done?" inquired the parson.

"The first thing to do is to administer on their estates," replied the General.

"But have we any right to meddle with their property?"

"Speaking as a jurist of considerable experience," said General Houston impressively, "I do not hesitate to declare that the doings of these persons, just now and for a long time past, were contraband of the public peace, and that dying intestate their estates rightfully escheat to the community they have robbed and terrorized. Therefore I would recommend that whatever property they may have left be added to the graveyard fund, to cover the expense of their burial and to encourage contributions of a similar kind."

General Houston was looked upon in that section as an unchallengeable legal authority, and no further warrant than his opinion was required for rifling the tills of the lansquinet and faro tables. About twenty-two thousand dollars in coin and gold dust was found, which was at once turned into the graveyard fund.

Contemplating the huge treasure heap and the three corpses, Dobie Joe arose once more, and said:

"Mr. Chairman, in view of the sum realized and of the present need and possible future requirement, I move that the Pickeye graveyard shall contain at least fifty acres, and that the flag shall be a forty-foot one."

The motion was carried without a dissenting voice. The meeting then adjourned, the bodies were removed, and the Long Tom resumed the even tenor of its way.

Before the next afternoon, when the triple funeral was to take place, public sentiment respecting the dead underwent a change. It had been proposed at first to bury them in an obscure corner of the projected graveyard. But, as the matter was more and more discussed, it was conceded they were entitled to greater consideration; and as Providence in its inscrutable way had ordained that their fortunes should be the cornerstone of the Pickeye graveyard and they the first fruits to be garnered in it, it was at length agreed that they should have a place of honor. So their graves were dug on a knoll near the center of the selected grounds, the whole community turned out to swell the funeral cortege, and Elder Beals in his sermon made some touching allusions to the deceased having builded better than they knew and to the blood of the martyrs being the seed of the church, and then he sounded "taps" over them with his tin horn.

A graceful feature of the occasion was the recital by C. Augustus Dinkey, the aspiring young Foothill Bard, of the following exquisite poem, which it was voted should be inscribed as an epitaph on a contemplated monument:

IN MEMORIAM

Here underneath the mourner's feet
Lie Double Cross and Frogmouth Pete,
And in the interval between Reposes gentle Josephine.

She come betwixt them once before,
Her interference then brought gore;
But no more bullets will she stop,
For neither now can get the drop.

They never did much work until
The end, but then they done it well;
And so they teach us while they rest
That one's last lick may be his best.

Within a month, fifty acres of the flat and hillside on the outskirts of Pickeye had been inclosed by a gaudily painted fence, a hundred-and-fifty-foot flag-staff raised on the knoll in the center of the lot, and the forty-foot flag procured from San Francisco.

The first day of September was fixed upon as the date of the consecration, and during the intervening weeks the whole country roundabout was astir with preparation for the event. It had become a settled belief that the late Fourth of July celebration at Pickeye had exhausted all the possibilities of pageantry. Nothing like it had ever been seen in the Southern Mines, and that section bore the palm for display; but it was now foreseen that even that memorable occasion was about to be eclipsed.

The splendor of the chosen day showed that Nature had reserved herself for the opportunity. The peals of Elder Beals's tin horn aroused the citizens of Pickeye from their slumbers an hour earlier than usual, and throughout the morning its notes were heard summoning the people to be instructed in the parts assigned them. Every place of business was closed except the saloons. They had doubled their force of bartenders.

By nine o'clock the delegations from the outlying districts began to arrive. First came a cavalcade of two hundred men on burros, from down the river, herding about an equal number of Chinamen; next came a phalanx on foot from up the river, with a cinnamon bear and a caged coyote in their ranks; then down the mountain sides streamed the legions of miners from the dry diggings and five hundred Digger Indians on ponies, followed by Arkansaw and his vaqueros, with a thousand Mexican steers from off the range.

Elder Beals was mounted on a magnificent white stallion, and by trumpet call and the assistance of aids marshaled the forces into line as fast as they poured in. By ten o'clock the procession was formed, and led by Elder Beals and the brass band it marched and countermarched through the streets of Pickeye and over the adjoining flat until it finally passed under the grand archway of the new graveyard, cattle and all.

The dedicatory exercises were in keeping with the parade. Elder Beals dismounted and opened them with prayer. Then the speaker of the day, General Houston, excelled himself in eloquence, if that were possible for one whose oratory was already the pride and boast of the Southern Mines. Unfortunately the effort itself is lost, but a faint conception of it may be gathered from the fact that in after days General Houston stoutly maintained that Lincoln stole his Gettysburg address bodily from the Pickeye graveyard oration, though the General had never thought it worth while to call him to account for it or inquire how it came into his possession.

But luckily time has withheld its obliterating finger from the ode delivered by C. Augustus Dinkey, the young Foothill Bard. There are some fifty versions of it extant, for during the month he was at work upon it he covered reams of paper which he scrupulously preserved, but it is given only in the form which he considered perfect.

GRAVEYARD ODE

There may be men with souls so tame
 "They'd die like brutes and rot the same,
 But we with sentiments more pure
 Aspire to better sepulture,
 And that desire is evidenced
 By fifty acres here—well fenced.

'Tis common ground. Within this yard
 The footwear question is debarred.
 Equality reigns here; no scoff
 Comes whether boots are on or off
 When you receive the final call,
 Or if you haven't boots at all.

Then, let it fill our hearts with cheer
 To think we all are welcome here,
 Unclassed and irrespectively
 Of how we chance to live or die,
 And that Tuolumne's low surge
 For all alike will be a dirge.

The applause that greeted the young poet's brilliant recital had just died away and Elder Beals was stepping forward to pronounce a benediction, when the cinnamon bear broke away from its keepers and stampeded Arkansaw's band of steers. There was an ominous pawing of hoofs, a terrific bellowing, and then a furious rush of cattle, with tails in air, carrying away a whole broadside of the graveyard fence.

"Under the circumstances," said Elder Beals, amid the confusion that ensued, "I will simply say that Heaven seems to have blessed our undertaking."

But his voice was drowned by that of Arkansaw, who had leaped ahorse and was shouting to his vaqueros: "The infernal brutes! Round 'em up quick!"

The unfortunate incident threatened to bring the ceremonies to an inglorious conclusion, but the situation was saved by Dobie Joe, who sprang to the halyards and hoisted the big American flag, shouting: "Wait! wait! boys, for the glory of Pickeye and the nation to float to the breeze!"

His action checked the panic; and as the glorious banner unfolded and streamed out in its full beauty, a cheer went up that brought responses from all the mountains.

And there it floated, lovely and majestic, a solace and inspiration to many a weary eye, until its tattered remnants told of the passing of the gorgeous public spirit that once was Pickeye's.

Treaties and State Rights

If men are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely, then there is excellent reason for looking forward to a correct solution of the question respecting the scope of the treaty-making power of this Government. Lawyers and publicists are burning a lot of midnight oil in the study of this profound constitutional question, and the discussion of it has given great stimulus to the flow of printer's ink. It is a question that must eventually be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, but meanwhile that tribunal is getting the benefit of the enlightened views of many distinguished citizens, some of whom know the constitution backwards and are familiar with all the decisions that touch upon the line of demarcation between the functions of the National Government and those of the States. We recently mentioned the points of an argument which we conceived to be conclusive of the finality of a treaty; even of a treaty which infringed upon a right withheld from the Union. That argument we are told was refuted by the Hon. Isidor Raynor, United States Senator from Maryland, who was so well pleased with the way he handled his subject that he had his speech printed in pamphlet form and widely circulated. Mr. Raynor plunged to the depths of constitutional law, but brought up very little in support of his position. His thesis is that the States have granted to the Federal Government only such treaty-making powers as are necessary to carry out the purpose of the Government as constituted by the Constitution, and while he contends that the Federal Government has not the right "to incorporate in a treaty powers not delegated to the United States or barter away rights reserved to the States," his argument consists largely of declaratory sentences. There is an hiatus between his premiss and his conclusion. He "tramples upon appalling doctrines" and "denies that decisions apply," but there is no visible train of reasoning to be followed through the labyrinth of his perfervid utterances. Senator Raynor does not refute; he merely superinduces confusion worse confounded. He is not even reliable as an authority respecting the purposes of the makers of the Constitution. At least we think not since he is at variance with Alexander Hamilton, who, we believe, was much better informed, having played an important part in the framing of that masterpiece of organic law. Hamilton is a pretty good authority to consult when in doubt about construction. Though an ardent Federalist he addressed himself to the men who were jealous of State rights and yet from his papers it may be apprehended that it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution to place restrictions on the treaty-making power. Before the adoption of the Constitution it was urged that treaties should be repealable at pleasure. Hamilton said it would be well for men entertaining that view to reflect "that a treaty is only another name for a bargain; and that it would be impossible to find a nation who would make any bargain with us which should be binding on them absolutely, but on us only so long and so far as we may think proper to be bound by it." He added: "Let us not forget that treaties are made not by only one of the contracting parties, but by both." The point in all this to be applied to the question at issue is that we must consider the rights and conveniences of the nations with whom we bargain, and that if it should appear to them that the President and the Senate have not plenary authority in the making of treaties they will have a right to conclude that we are in need of one of the forms of national government that are recognized by the law of all nations. That Hamilton believed the Constitution vested the President and the Senate with plenary authority for treaty making purposes may be inferred from the general tenor of his arguments in support of the Constitution. He said, among other things, that the power to make treaties is an essential branch of the Federal Government, adding: "If we are to be one nation in any respect, it clearly ought to be in respect to other nations." He called attention to the fact that while the Articles of Confederation expressed the power to make treaties, they were defective in that "treaties might be substantially frustrated by regulation of the States," and he asserted that under the Constitution "there could be no such embarrassment." In one of his papers he referred to the fact that objections were being urged against vesting the treaty-making power in the President and only one branch of the Congress and after insisting on the wisdom of excluding Representatives from participation in performances that sometimes demand great secrecy he suggested that there was nothing to fear from the President and Senate. They should be expected, he said, to conserve the interests of the country, and in this connection he remarked that there was one way of justifying repudiation of a treaty and that was by proving that it was corruptly made. Under the law of nations a treaty tainted with corruption is not binding. In explaining what was meant by the clause affirming treaties to be the supreme law of the land Hamilton said: "If it were otherwise the world would see for the first time a system of government founded on an inversion of the fundamental principles of all government. It would see the authority of the whole society, everywhere subordinate to the authority of the parts; it would see a monster with the head under the direction of the members." It is argued by Senator Raynor and others that treaties are the supreme law of the land only in so far as they are in accord with the Constitution. But that is not what the Constitution says. The supreme law of the land as defined by the second clause of the Sixth Article includes "the Constitution and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof and the treaties made by their authority." It does not say that in order to be endowed with supremacy the treaties must be made pursuant to the Constitution. It says that treaties made by authority of the Constitution are the supreme law of the land; in other words, treaties made by the President with the consent of the Senate. The probability is the framers of the Constitution assumed that the tranquility and prosperity of the whole country were more important than the dignity or interests of a part, and that in our relations with foreign countries circumstances might arise that would make it necessary for the treaty-making power to exercise a broad discretion, which would be impossible were it constrained to consider something more than the welfare of the nation.

Oratory In the Senate

It is one of the delusions of the day that eloquence no longer illuminates debate in the United States Senate. Occasionally there are lamentations over the decay of oratory in the Upper House of Congress which is so frequently referred to as the millionaire's club as to have come to be looked upon as the luxurious retreat of men of little wit afflicted with penury of speech and rich only in the pecuniary sense of the term. And yet the Senate abounds in flippant tongues and gifted tongues, and every day speeches are made in the Senate that edify and excite to rapture especially, as quite often happens, when one Theodore Roosevelt is being excoriated or ridiculed. For strange to say the Senate has not yet learned that the prevailing popular view of the Upper House is that it consists of a lot of plutocrats who are indignant because the President is keeping his eye on them to see that they don't steal the country. They are forever setting traps for him and he is getting caught every little while, but the Senate waits in vain for applause from the gallery. The notion is still prevalent that with all his faults Roosevelt is redeeming the country from the predatory rich, and Senators must assuage themselves in words. Some very good speeches have been made in dignified arraignment of the country's Chief Magistrate and they make excellent reading because they smell neither of the lamp or the inkhorn. The newspapers have been accused of exterminating the art of oratory by their practice of reporting speeches. While this practice has stimulated the flow of words it has certainly in a measure impaired its quality by destroying its essential element—spontaneity. The orator has been transformed by the press into an essayist. Instead of adapting his speech to the tone and spirit of his environment with his thoughts only on his subject and his audience, he harangues all Christendom in a lecture prepared for publication through fear of the butchery that is inevitable when an extemporaneous talk is converted into what some reporter thought was said. But when a member of the Congress speaks his speech it is taken down in shorthand and his remarks are often extemporaneous. Speeches worth reading are printed in the Congressional Record nearly every day. Foraker's speeches are usually both entertaining and instructive for he is an able debater, a master of dialectical fence, an orator whose eloquence consists of reason and passion skilfully fused. Though of less amplitude of mind Senator Beveridge is blessed with richness of imagination. He is known as the boy orator of Indiana, and he has a brand of language all his own and intoxicates Senate stenographers with his eloquence. Sweet as the siren's tongue his accents fall and whenever he speaks the listening galleries dwell on the melting music as it gushes forth. One of the star orators of the Senate is Rayner of Maryland, but it may be said of some of his speeches that what they want in depth they give you in length, for he has the habit of drawing out the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his logic. But he is at his best when jolting the President. "Of course," he said the other day, "if the people have come to the conclusion that everything that the President recommends is right, then there is hardly any use in contesting any of his propositions or recommendations, and instead of conferring upon him the power to give Congress information of the state of the Union, we might confer upon him the function of furnishing his own peculiar views upon the entire state of the universe and recommending any improvements or changes in the general plan of creation that he may deem expedient, from the cradle to the grave." And the Senate applauded uproariously.

Oratory In the House

Incessantly is the full tide of eloquence poured along in the House. The other day so prosaic a topic as the River and Harbor Appropriation bill evoked an outburst of oratory from Mr. Candler of Mississippi. It had for its basis the beauties of the Tombigbee, which flows through Mr. Candler's district. "There is no place," Mr. Candler rhapsodized, "where the sun shines more beautifully and the moon lights up with her silver rays with more grandeur than on this beautiful river. Why, my friends, this river has been sought for far and wide by those seeking that which was beautiful and for that which was grand. They have sought it because it furnished an invitation to admire the beauties of nature, because along it from one end to the other the grandeur and sublimity of Almighty God's creation shines forth with a degree of perfection that is scarcely reached in any other country in the world. [Applause.] My friends, the Mississippi sinks into insignificance in its grandeur and its beauty when it comes in comparison with the Tombigbee. I have heard its murmuring waves as they went singing their beautiful song toward the Gulf since the early days of my childhood, and they have continued to sing along the path of my life and have given me inspiration to love the beauties of nature and admire those grandeurs and those glories that come alone from the great creative hand of God above." Champ Clark, the Chautauqua orator of Mississippi, took occasion the other day to give the House a sample of his sarcasm in a speech on the various plans proposed by the press for President Roosevelt after his retirement in 1909. "Some have suggested," he said, "that he go to the United States Senate. If New York intends to continue in the unhappy habit of electing Republicans to the United States Senate, then my voice is for Roosevelt for that position. Another suggestion is that he shall be president of Harvard College. A noble ambition, surely. I would rather be president of the University of Missouri than be a member of the House or a member of the Senate or Governor of that imperial Commonwealth. Another suggestion is that he devote his life to literature. He would have an immense audience to begin with, and it would make him a fortune. Another is that he shall be perpetual President [laughter] of the Hague arbitration tribunal. [Applause.] It is safe to say that he would discharge the functions of that high office with a great deal of energy, and what he would do to the other peacemakers who had plans different from his would be a plenty. [Laughter.] Another suggestion is that he be made general manager of the Panama Canal. Of all these propositions that would be to me the most tempting. To build an Isthmian canal has been the dream of men since John Balboa first looked down in amazement and delight upon the peaceful ocean, and if that work is a success the man whose name is linked with it will write his name upon the scanty list of the immortals. Why Shonts or Wallace or any other man that had a chance to link his name with it should relinquish that opportunity for any financial inducement whatever is one of those things which, like the peace of God, passeth all understanding." [Laughter.]

Tommy to Become a Singer

Surgeon-General Evatts of the British army is in favor of teaching the soldiers to sing. He instances any number of moral and scientific reasons why singing is for the betterment of Tommy Atkins, but it should seem enough that the men would find pleasure in it. No doubt they would appreciate a little voice cultivation, but the probability is that if singing became part of the discipline of the army, it would lead to a prescribed programme of patriotic odes echoing exalted sentiments and devoid of "go." To make of pleasure a duty is bad enough but to prescribe its form as well is intolerable. In our own country we are taught that "America," "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "Hail Columbia!" are the national anthems, which is all right enough, but supposing we had to sing them! "The Star-Spangled Banner" has been chosen above all others to express patriotic sentiment, but to the majority it is unsingable. Owing to the Civil War it was not that nor the made-to-measure "Battle Hymn" that caught the fancy of the boys in blue, but the readily adaptable and often rowdyish "John Brown's Body," for which new verses were improvised nearly every time it was sung. One of Sep. Winner's songs, "Give Us Back Our Old Commander," which was published just after General McClellan was deposed, had such a vogue that it was forbidden by a special law. Not only were the men in the ranks enjoined, but public singers as well, and dealers were under penalty if they offered it for sale. But it is as difficult to suppress a song as legislate one into popularity. The British Government has already had experience in regulating vocal music, for it tried to interdict the singing of "The Wearing of the Green" in Ireland, but with no more success than attended the efforts made in France to banish the "Marseillaise" from the tongues of ardent Frenchmen. It has long been known that he soldier is a sentimentalist and that music stimulates the martial spirit. There is nothing like a song with a stirring lilt to revive the drooping senses or move to deeds heroic. The severest test of soldiers is to keep still under fire, and the mere order to march or shoot is an immense relief to the nervous tension. Soldiers have been known to find relief in song, as in the Crimean War when the whole British army, as related by Bayard Taylor, burst spontaneously into the singing of "Annie Laurie." And George W. Cable says of the wailing and lugubrious "Lorena," "it was the 'Annie Laurie' of the Confederacy. Kipling's soldiers all sing under more or less provocation, just as often something suggestive of a banshee's wailing as a rollicking regimental ditty. Cromwell's Puritans marched into battle singing hymns and President Roosevelt has said that there is no better fighting tune in the world than "Garryowen." The German army is not behind other German organizations in its love of song, and Noah Brooks tells how the hint was taken when, in crossing the plains a number of young Germans, members of a Verein, marched with their arms on each other's shoulders and sang as they stepped briskly forward until others of the company learned to lighten their own foot-toil in the same fashion. Even though the British Army shall never become famous for fine singing, the discipline of acting together will not be a loss, and if, as we are frequently reminded, singing is in itself a cure for weak lungs, perhaps the experiment may prove of value in another direction, that of overcoming to some degree the stooping shoulders and narrow chests which, it is now said, are characteristic of the recruits.

A Desecrated Grade

The advisability of abolishing the rank of Lieutenant-General is being urged at Washington. It is argued, and quite properly, that the grade of Lieutenant-General is entirely superfluous in a time of peace, and that as a mark of distinction it will lose its value unless it be abolished. The proponents of the proposition appear to have lost sight of the fact that as a mark of distinction it has already lost its value, and therefore that it doesn't make much difference whether it be abolished or perpetuated. When General Corbin was made Lieutenant-General, the prestige of the grade expired, and it can never again be revived. If the grade could be abolished for all time with the understanding that as General Corbin had proved its worthlessness as a mark of distinction it would be vain to confer it on anyone, then something might be gained by taking the desired action. Then General Corbin's memory would be perpetuated on the strength of his most notable achievement, and philosophical historians might cite the incident in justification of a warning to all future warriors against seeking distinction on anything less substantial than merits. In bringing the rank of Lieutenant-General into ridicule Corbin caused no great amount of damage to anyone but himself. In assuming, without the stamp of merit, an undeserved dignity, he gave wings to the fame of mediocrity. But he did not diminish the glory of his predecessors; not, at least, that of the men by whom the title of Lieutenant-General was made a mark of distinction. The first that held it was Washington and then came Scott, neither of whom is remembered for his title. The civil war gave us four Lieutenant-Generals—Grant, Sherman, Sheridan and Schofield—making a total of six in 125 years. Schofield not having attained the honor until 1845 after a long struggle. All save Schofield are the pet heroes of the nation; and it is a far cry from Corbin to Schofield. During the past six years Lieutenant-Generals have been turned out at the rate of one a year, but of the six, five were veterans of the civil war. Corbin's military record was the reverse of glorious. His greatest triumphs were of a purely political character, and not deliciously savory either. Hence we say that he has brought the noble grade of Lieutenant-General into ridicule, and when we ponder the great names that have given lustre to it we feel that he should not go unpunished for the desecration. Because they shone on him he would reach the stars, but now that he is looking into the clouds it would be well if he could be made to regret the base degrees by which he did ascend ambition's ladder.

The Flats and Hotels of Paris

By Major Ben C. Truman

There are Flats and Flats in Paris—the French flat and the American flat. The French flat is an “appartement,” or a floor; and the American flat is the rashly unfortunate being who is beguiled into renting it. Ergo, whenever you see the words “appartement a louer” nailed upon a good-looking house in an inviting locality, shun the place as you would a case of leprosy or the bubonic plague.

Some of them are called “private hotels,” or “pensions”; but these are only other more pretentious appellations for the same apocryphal outfit—the handles of the big front door, the concierge, the cat, the elevator—that only carries passengers one way and so much slower than a funeral as to make the cat laugh—the marble stairways, the Venetian mirrors, Smyrna carpets, luxurious portierres, tapestried walls, frescoed ceilings, Louis XVI furniture—warranted to break the first time it is used—the bronze clocks and candlestick, are at all these “appartements a louer,” be they “pensions,” flats, or suites belonging to “widows of lamented officers of the army and navy,” or any other chestnutty device.

But when you pass under the porte cochere, and “montee,” and are then shown the “premiere etage,” or first floor—which is next above the entresol; which is in reality the second floor—which is, by the way, as paradoxical as true—you discover that there are no stationary water arrangements, no steam nor air heat, not bath nor toilette room, and in most places neither gas nor electric lights—although these latter are being slowly introduced. Someone has exuberantly exclaimed:

“Give us the luxuries of life—the necessities can take care of themselves!”

To that jocund person the Paris flat is exquisitely adapted; for there are the luxuries of life till you can't rest, even to the carved hat racks, bronze vases, Moorish chiselings, modern and ancient engravings and paintings, elaborate fireplace implements and adornings, and much else that appeals to an aristocratic desire; but the lavatory, the bath, the toilette and the incandescent are still coming on a slow freight that has been a long time ditched.

Then there are two or three other floors nearly as elaborately furnished—and the top floor for servants and other lodgers. All who pay their way and appear sober and genteely dressed are eligible as permanent lodgers—no questions are asked and no marriage certificates called for.

The elevator is for the use of “masters” (gentlemen of the flat and their friends, or families,) but never a domestic, nor a laundress, nor any other person—not even that most brassy of all American nuisances, the messenger boy. Only two or three persons can squeeze themselves into a French elevator, which must be always sent down empty in order “not to waste power”—for, be it known, there is no superfluity of even elevator power in Paris—there is no superfluity of anything but “Merci, Monsieur.” Thanks (merci) are the only things ever given away in Paris, and these are showered upon you by everybody, in every way, at every turn.

But there are other adjuncts than the elevator—the kitchen and the salon; one, seemingly, as important as the other. As a whole the Parisian house is from three to five stories in height above the entresol; and then there is the mansard or French roof. The ground floor is always occupied by stores or business of some character; then comes the entresol; two or three feet lower than the premiere, generally a genteel array of workshops; then comes the premiere (or first) floor, then the second, third, and so on, to the mansard. Each of these floors, so-called, contains salon, salle a manger, kitchen, and from two to six other apartments, called “masters' chambers”—which term means bedrooms—or for other purposes. On the outside there are balconies on the premiere and fourth floors, and thus the entresol is made to appear more inferior in height than it really is. Between the entresol and the mansard, then, the better classes domicile; the salon is an immense gaudy parlor that is always in use; and the kitchen—well, the French kitchen is the ne plus ultra of “little big” things, and unostentatiously betrays what may be done with abbreviated space and transcendent ingenuity. In planning his dining cars Mr. Pullman must have had in mind, among other multum in parvo achievements, the Paris (or French) kitchen, which is six feet wide, ten feet long, with range, gas stove, stone floor and stone sink, and all the implements necessary for the preparation of meals for many people.

When one of Napoleon's generals visited the Inquisition rooms of Spain he saw what seemed to be one of the most elegant and luxurious armchairs that had ever been fashioned; but when one of his staff officers sat in it there pierced his body a hundred daggers like a flash. The French flat is not unlike this chair of the Inquisition. It is sumptuous in the extreme. Its ceilings are frescoed and its walls are hung with tapestries and mirrors. Its windows are draped and curtained in velvet and lace. Its floors are inlaid and covered with rugs. All its other appointments are alike opulent and luxurious, its many clocks and candlesticks being either in brass or bronze. But woe to the man who engages a furnished “apartment.” The chair of the Inquisition was never more fatal.

Neither has Paris progressed much with its hotels. London has far outstripped the French capital in this respect. The Elysee Palais and the Regina are new and more acceptable than any of the others. But on the whole Paris has no first-class hotels whatever compared with those in London and in the United States—except in prices. The Elysee Palace Hotel is luxuriously furnished and appointed, but its seven or eight course dinner consists of about the same old thing the year

Evolution of the Auto

With the automobile show at hand interest in the modern horseless chariot has become more widespread than ever. The automobile won its way into our affections during the days of stress and trouble some ten months ago, and since then the chauffeur has met with forbearance all along the line. The auto show will be worth attending, even if you have not and indulge no hope of ever having a gasoline wagon. It will be instructive and entertaining for it will embody one of the marvels of modern scientific achievement. It is not search for the first one leads back into the dimmest pages of history. Mankind seems to have yearned for the automobile ever since domestic troubles first made swift traveling desirable. Some sort of a sledge that would bump down a side slope was probably the first form of an automoving carrier, aside from slaves and beasts of burden. It has been cited by the scholastic Solons of the motor clubs that the automobile was introduced as a war machine several centuries ago, when some of the gentle warriors of classic times filled a

AN EIGHTEENTH CENTURY AUTO

This machine was built in 1770 by N. J. Cugnot, who is generally known as the father of Automobilmism. But for the French Revolution, which turned men's minds entirely away from this form of mechanics, he might have anticipated George Stephenson. His machine consisted of a wooden chassis, with three wheels. The boiler, a kettle-like contrivance, was in front, and the single fore-wheel was driven by two cylinders. The steering arrangement was not unlike that of the present day, and there were non-skidding tires. The machine still exists and was recently placed in one of the museums in Paris.

easy to remember the appearance of the first auto you ever saw. You may think it is because you know that the up-to-date auto bears a resemblance in a general way, but it will amaze you to discover the vast difference and it will interest you to see how an ugly vehicle has, in imperceptible stages, been metamorphosed into a thing of beauty without losing its distinctive features. The automobile is not only the result of years of physical evolution, but also of centuries of intellectual progress. The horseless carriage is so old that its origin is not to be traced into the remote past. It has existed in some or another form in every age, and wheeled box full of stones and launched it down hill into the ranks of the enemy. From prehistoric times the idea of eliminating the horse and donkey as hauling powers took possession of imaginative minds, and the horseless carriage was a recurring dream which at various times found more or less definite expression on paper, though not in fact. It has been said that the motor car is an evolution from the bicycle, but this is a careless way of putting it, to say the least. The fact is that the desire to get rid of draught animals and produce an automatic wagon came first of all, and the primary products of it were manumotive vehicles, from which the dandy horse, the velocipede and the modern bicycle were developed. Considering this, it may be accepted that the automobile was not evolved through the bicycle, that neither is the automobile the father of the manumotive vehicle, but that the automobile idea is the parent of both. The bicycle was the first fruition of the thought and striving, that is all. A road vehicle propelled from within appears to have actually existed before the Christian era dawned, for in "The Ethiopics" Heliodorus refers to a triumphal car at Athens that was "moved along by men carried therein." Pancerollus also mentions these chariots. A Chinese contrivance with wheels that was punted along by poles and others that were rowed on land are recorded as wonders in the sixth or seventh century. Certain it is that the automobile is not of the mushroom growth that many accredit it with being, but that it has been a true product of evolution. Also, it is apparently certain that the real self-moving vehicle, actuated by mechanical power, was successfully demonstrated before the steam railway car. The commercially practical motor car has been a thing of rapid development within the last decade, but motor driven vehicles for road use that were practical in that they were capable of traveling and dirigible, date back to the eighteenth century, while during the seventeenth century wagons driven by spring power and by sails were employed in Germany and the Netherlands. It even seems possible that there was in Turkey a genuine automobile driven by explosive power, though not of a practical sort, as long ago as 1585, for Edward Webb, an English writer of travels, describes a cunning piece of fireworks, framed like an ark, that carried forty men within it and was driven by "thirteene thousand severall peeces of fire worke." Prophecies of the motor car and explicit forecasts there were in plenty. In the thirteenth century Friar Roger Bacon (1214-1294) declared that it would yet be possible to make wagons go without horses and not long afterward Leonardo da Vinci (1452-1519) made a sketch of a gearing for a self-moving carriage, which he declared was practicable, but which he did not demonstrate. In 1625 a petition was filed in England by John Marshall for "a new invention of a cart of 15 cwt., to carry a great burden without help of horses and guided but by himself." Letters patent dated October 10, 1644, were granted by Louis XIV. to Jean Theson for "the privilege of employing a little four wheel carriage, set in motion without any horses, but merely by two men seated." The second century steam engine of Hero was employed in the seventeenth century for a toy steam wagon made by Verbiest, a missionary in China, and Sir Isaac Newton is reported to have used the same idea, a kettle with the spout turned rearward and provided with a single steam jet apparatus somewhat similar to contemporaneous steam toys. In 1782 James Watt patented a double acting engine, which he thought "might be employed to give motion to wheel carriages." Before this, in 1769, a Frenchman, Nicholas Joseph Cugnot, invented what is most generally conceded to be the first steam automobile. This was a trolley vehicle, built with state funds, and in the following year he built a second one, showing improvements, which was exhibited at the Tuilleries in 1789. This contrivance was fatally defective in that it had only a single wheel for both driving and steering. Watt did not put his patent to the trial, but other British experts took up the subject, and for more than fifty years, well into the nineteenth century, there was remarkable activity in the building of steam carriages in both Europe and America. George Stephenson,

Richard Trevithick, Walter Hancock, Goldsworthy Gurney, David Gordon, William Brunton and others were the leaders of the movement in England, while in the United States steam vehicles were brought out by Oliver Evans, Nathan Read, Thomas Blanchard and others. Read produced his carriage in 1789, and it was more practical than that of Cugnot. Oliver Evans obtained in 1787 the right to operate steam road wagons in Pennsylvania and Maryland, and in 1805 built a combined road wagon and boat. The first notable improvement of the nineteenth century was that of Richard Trevithick of England, who with Andrew Vivian patented in 1802 a steam carriage having a flywheel on the crankshaft and the latter connected with the driving wheels by gearing. This was the first steam vehicle with transmission gearing.

Soon after the close of the first quarter of the nineteenth century the interest in steam road carriages grew to impressive proportions in England, and it seemed for a time as if this type of vehicle was destined to permanent use and to revolutionize travel on the highways. In 1833 there were not less than twenty such vehicles in and around London and a dozen corporations had been organized to operate motor roadway lines over stated routes. That was the time when the automobilists of to-day who rant about prejudice and adverse legislation should have lived, for these were what chilled and killed the budding bloom of steam highway lines. For a decade or two the activity in the developing of the automobile ceased. The "locomotive act" of Great Britain, requiring the man to walk ahead with a flag, was a sufficient deterrent to inventors in that kingdom, and when the activity was renewed it was in France. This was in the early seventies, and may be said to mark the beginning of the automobile era, for some of the men who then began to turn out experimental automobiles kept at it until in the eighties and nineties they had produced commercially practical vehicles, and several of their names are identified to-day with well known makes of motor cars. It is by no means to be inferred that American inventors were idle during this season of renewed activity in developing the automobile. Motor vehicles of merit were produced in the United States by so many different men that space prevents even the mention of the work of all of them, or their names. One notable invention was made in 1859, when J. K. Fisher of New York brought out a small steam carriage which made fifteen miles an hour. The modern automobile period began about 1889, when the Daimler liquid hydro-carbon engine appeared in a form which held out some promise of success in the use of it for road vehicles. Not that the gasoline engine was new at this time, but the adaptation of it for motor cars was the object being sought. In this work, however, Daimler and the other Europeans were anticipated by an American, according to the historians, for in 1879 there was filed in the Patent Office at Washington an application for a vehicle with a liquid, hydro-carbon engine of the compression type, having a transmission capable of being disconnected with the engine, the feature so necessary on all practical automobiles to-day. The first successful gas engine originated in Germany. The first long-distance successful trip in this country was made by Alexander Winton in the 90's, from Cleveland to New York.

HOW SANTA CLAUS FIRST WENT ABOVE PICKEYE

A railroad runs past the site of Pickeye now, and winds in and out of the canyons beyond until it disappears in the heart of the Sierras, so the region is no longer the almost inaccessible fastness it was half a century ago. There are orchards and vineyards on every sunny slope, gardens and cottages in every pleasant vale, and over them all bends a sky to which the reflected serenity has given a fresh charm. But whatever new glories may crown the scene or whatever joys may swell in other hearts, they can never dim the splendor and delight of that Christmas more than fifty years ago when Santa Claus first went above Pickeye.

Only the roughest of wagon-roads penetrated the region then, and Pickeye was its terminal point. The remoter camps were reached by the merest trails, over which the miners trudged on foot and supplies were carried by pack-animals.

One of the principal of these outlying camps was Lang's Bar, five miles up the creek from Pickeye. There were rich diggings on the flat and in the tributary gulches, but the spot was even richer in scenic beauty than in gold. It was almost a perfect amphitheater, about half a mile in extent, shut in by lofty mountains, except for a narrow canyon to the east and a broader one where the stream, after slackening its speed through the bar, rushed away again to the west.

Those were days when California had forests indeed, their native keepers, the Indians, having learned through ages of experience the wisdom of burning the undergrowth and fallen leaves as often as a fire would run through them; so the noble growth of pines and oaks that crowned the summits and adorned the slopes around Lang's Bar stood in park-like majesty and openness, stately, vigorous, unscathed, no tangled undergrowth choking the vistas, through which the deer might be seen a mile away.

The bar itself was smooth as a lawn, and on this particular Christmas-tide as verdant also; for in addition to the pines, cedars, water-oaks and manzanitas that held up their standard of perpetual greenery, an alternation of warm rains and sunshine had stirred to early life a grassy growth that coated it like emerald.

There was human life, too, and much of it—busy, boisterous, happy life. From one end of the bar to the other could be heard the songs and shouts of men at work in the bed or banks of the stream, mingled with the ring of picks, the screech of shovels on the long-toms and the boom of torrents and crash of rocks in the ground-sluices. Lang's Bar that season was a realization of the miner's dream, good diggings and plenty of water.

But there was also life that was not so ideal and joyous. Of the score or so log cabins strung along the banks of the stream, the one nearest the canyon at the lower end of the bar was the most pretentious, and its plan and surroundings bore evidence of a quality of domesticity lacking in all the others. There was a projection, or wing, at the eastern end and a porch filling out the nook formed by it, and in front, shadowed by a grove of young pines, were the rudiments of a flower-garden. The spot was not fenced, however. Everything was open and free as nature had made it, except the top of a small knoll just back of the cabin. A little picket inclosure there indicated that saddest of all things, a lone grave.

Under a shed at the rear of the cabin a woman was toiling over a washtub, the collection of rough garments showing that she was doing washing for the miners. Two children, a girl of six years and a boy of four, were playing by the trail in front of the house. But their play appeared to have no merriment in it. It was the subdued, awed sport of children forever conscious of the shadow of a father's grave upon their playground, or who had been untimely weaned from mirth in some other way.

Their attention was diverted from their half-hearted pastime by the appearance of a big, broad-shouldered young man who came striding down the trail. As the children ran to meet him he slackened his pace and called out cheerily:

"Hello, Fanny! hello, Johnny! How are my little play-fellows to-day?"

Without any direct reply the children managed to assure him of their well-being and of their delight at seeing him.

"And how is your mama?" he asked.

"She's washing," replied Fanny. "Do you want to see her?"

"No, not now, I guess. I'm on my way to town; maybe I'll stop when I come back. To-morrow will be Christmas, you know. Are you little ones going to hang up your stockings to-night?"

"No," answered Fanny ruefully; "mama says it ain't no use."

"No use?" echoed the big miner, in astonishment. "Why not?"

"'Cause Santa Claus won't never come above Pickeye, she says."

"What makes her think so?"

"There ain't no road. Papa was going to build one; but there won't ever be one now, mama says."

"They put papa in a big hole in the ground up yonder," explained Johnny, to enlighten the apparently nonplused questioner.

The big miner gently lifted the little fellow to his shoulder, took Fanny by the hand, and walked on silently down the trail. But, after a little, he pressed Johnny's curls to his bearded face, set him carefully down, patted Fanny's cheek, and said, as if there had been no interruption of the conversation:

"Well, all the same, pretties, you hang up your stockings just outside the door. A little ground-squirrel told me something back yonder that makes me think Santa Claus is going to break his record and come above Pickeye to-night. Bye-bye. Remember me to your mama."

And the big fellow strode off down the canyon, sage Johnny remarking to his sister, as they watched the disappearing giant:

"Dobie Joe is the bestest man in the world now, 'cause he is just like papa used to be to us."

In Lent.

In raiment gray—as sadly gray
 As storm-hurt skies—unsmilingly,
 This morning Betty comes to pray;
 The church is dim * * * a single ray
 Of arrowy sunshine, straightly sped
 Through saint-set windows overhead,
 Tints her pale cheek beguilingly.

Her meditations match her gown.
 From earthly joys, with deep disdain,
 She turns, with contemplative frown;
 And pearly tears go trickling down
 Upon the violets at her breast.

Couleur de rose becomes her best!
 * * * * *

This morn she prays in pious pain;
 This eve she plays at Bridge again.

Perspective Impressions

Mr. "Ned" Hamilton says he doesn't understand the legislature at present in session in Sacramento. Perhaps the language of Colonel Mazuma this session is Esperanto.

The legislature might, in behalf of Senator Greenwell, pass a law barring an untenanted suit of clothes as proof of the corpus delicti in cases of apprehension in flagrante delicto.

A Royal Commission in Great Britain has reported that the drinking of raw milk is the chief cause of consumption. There are dairymen in California that protect the consumer from consumption by diluting the milk with liquids containing germs that destroy the tubercular bacilli.

It is needless to remark that nobody is reading the Thaw case except for its human interest.

The Pope it is said possesses a chair valued at $90,000. The one that Senator Clark occupies cost a quarter of a million.

To make concessions on the Japanese school question for the purpose of getting a treaty for the protection of American labor is to argue ourselves somewhat pharisaical.

The patriotic labor agitators of the Japanese and Korean Exclusion League are in no mood to be trifled with by the Japanese Government. They are abundantly equipped with deadly jawbones and there is no limit to their supply of defiance.

It is rumored that the skull and jawbone of the giant prehistoric man recently discovered in Nebraska will be named by the scientists "Oratoriuspresidential-candidatusagainos."

The Neglected Lute

By Mabel Porter Pitts.

A moldering casement's twilight chill where shivering ivy clings
Now holds the silence where a song once thrilled the vibrant strings.
Long, long ago an idle hand waked one unwilling tone
That now the far-off sea repeats in low, undying moan;
An east wind spoke its sad complaint when chafed its stinging blight
And whispered to a nightingale that told the listening night.
No singing, sun-kissed sound of earth now warms the deepening chill.
No passing breeze, however glad, finds one responsive thrill;
All mute it lies, each straining discord hushed in gathering rust,
The twisted strings confused and dead beneath decay and dust,
But had some kindly thought been born to light the lonely space
Or had some breath of gladsome ways filled up the empty place
Then had the lute found out that song which joy forever sings
And it had ever blessed the hand which woke the silent strings.

The Spectator

Martin's Humor

Walter Martin is something of a wag. He recently wrote to a friend in the East to the effect that he was thinking of building a home in Marin county so that he would be near his Burlingame friends when they moved to that side of the bay. From this subtle bit of jocosity one may infer that Walter knows something of the uneasiness of a bunch of Captains of Industry whose methods have been the subject of inquiry for some time. As the dailies haven't been giving much space to the progress of the graft prosecution of late it is generally supposed that Detective Burns has uncovered all the evidence of corruption that was accessible, but there are more sensations to come and when they do come it will be found that Burns has been living up to his reputation even though he should fail to vindicate the humor of Mr. Walter Martin.

Sympathetic Millionaires

There are several distinguished citizens identified with the exclusive social colony of this city who have no sympathy with the prosecution of Schmitz and Ruef. Indeed they are well satisfied with the municipal Administration, the City's plight moves them not to virtuous reprobation, indifferent are they to the obvious in civic affairs and the incompetency of conscienceless and incompetent public officials. Their own personal interests absorb all their attention, and these interests are not menaced by the grafting proclivities of the people's thrifty servants. Consequently they are inclined to scoff at Rudolph Spreckels and James D. Phelan for being so eager to break up the powerful combination that holds this city in its grasp. Much is said about the iniquitous capitalistic combination that is persecuting Schmitz and Ruef but that combination appears to comprise only Spreckels and Phelan, neither of whom has any interest in any public service corporation. Nobody charges that Captain Payson, who represents the powerful Parrott interests in the Spring Valley Water Company, is trying to railroad Schmitz into the penitentiary. Nobody accuses Billy Bourn of being behind the prosecution. Mr. Bourn is one of the men who are said to have bought a lot of Spring Valley stock some time ago when things were being shaped for the sale of the Spring Valley reservoir and pipe plant to the city so that it would be available as soon as Will Tevis turned over the Bay Cities Water System to the city. Will Crocker has so far managed to subdue his small voice of civic patriotism, a feat requiring no great effort since that gigantic water deal holds something of interest to him. Another of the prominent citizens who have so far repressed the impulses born of civic pride is Mr. Montford Wilson who has a happy faculty for reconciling his thoughts with those of Will Crocker. All these prosperous gentlemen have held themselves aloof from the prosecution. Not only that they condemn the methods of Spreckels and Phelan. By these wild-eyed reformers they are filled with well-bred horror. Perhaps none of them would hesitate to make the confession that George Newhall, a luminous Burlingame figure, made in open court when pleading to be excused from service with the Andrews grand jury—that he was a friend of the Administration.

Harvey's Associates Desert

What has become of that Coast railroad that Mr. J. Downey Harvey was building for the purpose of bringing the surf of Santa Cruz to our doors? It appears that operations have been suspended, and that Mr. Harvey is doing the Micawber stunt. It is rumored that his capital has petered out and that he is now trying to devise new ways and means of financing the great enterprise. My sympathies are with Mr. Harvey, for I have heard that he has been deserted by some of his associates. One of the latest to withdraw from the company is Mr. Walter Dean, who was one of the many wealthy San Franciscans thrown into financial panic by the loss of property in the April fire.

An Easy Bit of Financiering

It is a curious fact that it was principally among our very richest citizens that cold feet were prevalent during and immediately after the fire. Men of moderate fortunes took their losses stoically but the millionaires rushed home and discharged their servants and prepared for a protracted drought. One bank president lost his job as a consequence of his despair which threatened to become infectious and several shrewd financiers took such a hopeless view of the situation that they were easily induced to make very bad bargains. One of them was Mr. James L. Flood, whose sentiments respecting the real estate market immediately after the fire may be surmised from the character of a lease that he made covering the big gore lot at Market and Ellis streets. That property is worth $1,500,000 and at the rate at which values are climbing will be worth $2,000,000 before many years. Yet Flood surrendered possession of it for the rest of his natural life for two per cent on the present estimated value. The lessors are N. Scharlan, who formerly kept a small bazar in Chinatown, M. Rosenthal, who had a small wholesale business at Battery and Market streets and D. Freedman, who came to town shortly after the fire in quest of good things. These men took the lease on a shoestring, as the saying goes, agreeing to erect on the lot a building costing $100,000. They agreed to pay $30,000 a year for seven years, the rent to be raised thereafter until it reached $45,000 a year. And it was agreed that the rent should not commence to run until July of this year. So by these terms the enterprising gentlemen virtually obtained for nothing an option, for one year, on one of the finest pieces of property in the city. But that is not all of the story. They organized the New Era Investment Company and the other day they turned over half the stock to the Western National Bank in consideration of an agreement on the part of that institution to erect on the lot a two hundred thousand dollar building. It is estimated that the rentals will approximate between $80,000 and $100,000 a year, and that here will be a profit of between $40,000 and $60,000. The profits will be applied to the payment of the debt and interest and thereafter they will be divided among the stockholders. So the bank acquires a half interest in the lease for financing the enterprise, and after the debt is paid, or in about four years, each of the original lessees will begin to draw down about ten thousand dollars a year and continue to do so for the remainder of their lives.

The Thaw Case

A most astonishing phenomenon incident to the trial of Harry Thaw for the murder of Stanford White is the frank espousal of the murderer's cause by some of the daily papers. Ostensibly Harry Thaw is being tried under the Penal Code of the State of New York but quite obviously it is the so-called unwritten law upon which his counsel mainly depend and which is being invoked in the murderer's behalf. This fact the newspapers accept as though it did not call for reprehension. It even appears to be assumed that the jury is privileged to base a verdict on an unwritten law, and some of the more intellectually dishonest of the special writers are permitted to go so far as to insist that the defendant be acquitted under the infamous code that spells anarchy. It would be difficult to imagine a more vicious abuse of the license of the press. For here is a case signally exemplifying the iniquity of ignoring the written law which should be presumed to be adequate for the protection of society and of all individuals composing society. Here is a case which brings into startling relief the dangerous potentialities of that unwritten code which seems to be susceptible of adjustment as a palladium for the protection alike of dishonored gentlemen and the frenzied degenerates of the tenderloin.

A Fine Combination

In this curious case the unwritten code is not in itself sufficient to save the murderer from the electric chair. Nevertheless it is owing to the provocation which that code recognizes as a sufficient pretext for homicide that the murderer has the sympathy of the maudlin sentimentalists of the press. They assume that the provocation has been established though as a matter of fact the testimony to that end was introduced as evidence of the unhinging of a loose-jointed mind. Great are the opportunities for strategic manoeuvring under the disingenuous combination of the statutory insanity plea of justifiable homicide. Under that combination it matters not so much what the facts are as what the murderer believed them to be, and if he is as credulous as some of the special writers of New Year appear to be there is nothing sufficiently preposterous under the sun to excite his scepticism. Those writers are appalled at the unspeakable infamies of Stanford White, in behalf of whom it would be difficult to suggest the possibility of circumstances so palliative as to extinguish one speck of the odium that attaches to his memory, and yet it is quite easy to conceive a set of circumstances vastly at variance with Evelyn Thaw's narrative of her experience, a narrative so cunningly contrived to anticipate adverse testimony and so ruthless in some of its references, especially to Jack Barrymore, that one cannot but marvel that there should be experienced journalists so gullible as to accept it as the tale of an ingenue. Surely we may with absolute consistency sympathize from the bottom of our hearts with this erstwhile neglected child model of the studios and at the same time assume a cynical attitude with the aid of the reasonable reflection that misfortune schooled her to worse usage than could be borne without blushing embarrassment by a maiden fresh from the seminary.

An Aspect of the Trial

It is White rather than Thaw who is on trial in New York and White cannot defend himself. And howsoever inclined the District Attorney may be to defend him, his privilege is merely to prosecute Thaw, and there are rules of evidence that exclude proofs which he would, perhaps, like to introduce. This aspect of the situation does not interest the special writers. So much of their sympathy has the poor, unprotected but precocious child wife absorbed that they have none left for the lascivious, unlamented. It is sufficient for them to know that she is very young and that White was a lecherous rascal. Though very young she has had a world of experience and has been a source of great mischief, but her experience was most pathetic and Thaw is a hero who rescued her from a life of shame and then exposed her to the pity of the world. And as a consequence we are being deluged with drooling sentimentality that would nauseate a sailor fresh from the bilge. I would not court the charge of squeamishness and hypocrisy by asserting that it revolts me, this unexpurgated tale of libidinous phantasies. My journalistic apprenticeship in the sumps of the department of criminal justice fortified me against shocks from such sources, but this drama of the out-Zazaing of Zaza in real life with its sidelights on the canicular rages in which the heroine's lovers threaded their frenetic infatuation, is, I submit, hardly a suitable theme to inspire the chaste feminine philosophers of newspaperdom.

The Pretext for Exploitation

One of the very cunningly managed dailies prepared us for the mephitic irruption with a prefatory editorial shrewdly designed to forestall criticism of its impending appeal to the prurient. This editorial informed us that the case would deserve generous exploitation abounding as it would in human interest and in such moral lessons as should be afforded by familiarity with the evil results of a roue's iniquities and the miserable experience of the pampered son of indulgent parents. It is hard to acquiesce in this deft allurements of beneficent teaching and sacred purpose. Besides there is too much bad taste to be expectorated before you can savor the moral subtleties of the vulgar presentment. What proportion does the beneficence of it bear to the whole? How considerable a share of it is positively mischievous in its effects upon the popular mind in the erroneous ideas and unworthy predispositions it engenders! And above all how can any newspaper justify its sneaking advocacy of a principle by which a man is justified when impelled by no matter how great and how just a sense of grievance, he resorts to unwritten law and makes himself its tribunal and executioner.

Perniciousness of It

The final vengeance belongs to the law that is written, and by no other conception of justice can the deterrent force of capital punishment be of lasting influence. Harry Thaw may be crazy and if so he should go to an insane asylum, but whatsoever be the result of his trial the effect of it has been most pernicious, inculcating, as it has by reason of the manner in which the news of it has been handled in some papers, the notion that an unwritten law obtains in this country, and that a woman of the character of Evelyn Nesbit Thaw is of the substance of which heroines are fashioned. The unfortunate young woman is deserving of sympathy but she is not a figure to be transformed into a theatric martyr for the edification of the general. It is her misfortune that she is her mother's daughter and that she was started upon her career under no better auspices than have been the lot of bedraggled creatures of the quayside or the more prosperous that become the frolic of the dazzling tenderloin. She fell into the companionship of Stanford White, a practical esthete of the cult that worships Aphrodite Pandemos, a degraded wretch if you will, but possibly a trifle less vicious than he has been painted. Those writers by whom is being pictured the life that staggers through an atmosphere of stale champagne and musk sobbed dramatically over the tragic story of the sixteen-year-old girl's inveiglement and disillusionment, and yet how unconvincing was that confession! It is a story that might easily be altered to the advantage of White's memory. For it is slightly improbable that the man who had access to the stage entrances along Broadway would have pursued such dilatory tactics in the case of a chorus girl who had spent two years in the studios of New York as a model, and against whom the presumption lies in consequence of all the known circumstances of her career that even at the tender age of sixteen she had developed a mind of many colors and a mouth of many tunes and kisses. That drugging story—but, bah! there should be limits to balderdash and bathos, extremes beyond which vulgarity should not be permitted to go. This trial scrapes the very bottom of abysmal vulgarity. It is not a picture of life. It is a study in degeneracy, and despite the efforts of purveyors of cant the muck of it all is not to be refined in the germicidal rays of the sun of love.

Bret Harte's Cruelty

"However great Bret Harte was as a writer of California classics," says a gentleman in commenting on the poverty of the author's eccentric daughter, "however beautiful his stories of early life in the Golden West are, his treatment of his family was simply contemptible. For twenty years or more before his death he lived in London in ease, receiving a large and steady income from the sale of his writings. All this time his wife and two daughters were living in Plainfield, N. J., struggling to keep up appearances and to make both ends meet. Letters from the celebrated father and husband were few and far between, and remittances came still less frequently. What a bitter thing it is for those who are refined, educated and well born to put up a fight against poverty! And still the brave mother and her daughters were never heard by their friends to utter a harsh word against the husband and father who had taken himself out of their life and who lived in ease among the literary lights of London. So far as the outside world ever knew, Mrs. Harte, Jessamy and Ethel looked upon their father as a wonderful man and one of America's greatest writers. The daughters were brought up to revere him, while the mother bore her sorrow in silence. Why Bret Harte deserted his family so cruelly—for it can be called nothing less than desertion—is a mystery. No doubt in years to come it will be laid to the eccentricities of genius. Never once, after going abroad late in the '70s or early in the '80s, did Bret Harte return to this country, or did his wife and daughters visit him. After his death in London a few years ago Mrs. Harte and the youngest daughter went abroad, hoping he might have left something that would make their life a little smoother. But the genius had left nothing. Instead of getting a royalty on his books from his publishers he had received a stated sum annually, and this income ended with his death. All left for the family was the memory of a man looked upon as great by all except those who knew. Bret Harte also had two sons, but they were able to take care of themselves, and they did more for the mother and the two girls growing up to womanhood than their father ever did. They left home years ago, and neither is in this country, so far as former friends know. At last accounts Mrs. Harte and Ethel, who went to London after Bret Harte's death and were discovered living in poverty, were the beneficiaries there of a fund established by such prominent authors as Gilbert Parker, Conan Doyle, George Meredith and Anthony Hope Hawkins. Does it not seem strange that an author whose fine mind and seemingly inspired pen could blend love, sentiment, pathos and humor as Bret Harte has done in 'M'lis,' 'The Luck of Roaring Camp,' 'Salomy Jane's Kiss' and many other stories could be so brutal toward his own flesh and blood?"

The Sierra Poet's Latest Suggestion

Joaquin Miller is at it again. In the matter of tinkering with geographical names he runs the postal department a close second, but since it amuses him without harming other folks there should be no objection. At all events he is better than Tolstoi, who has as yet found nothing in the heavens above, the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth quite to his satisfaction—with the single exception of Count Lyof Tolstoi. This time Joaquin only wants to change the name of the Mississippi river. He would like the stream called the Missouri from the source in the Rocky mountains to the mouth at the Gulf of Mexico. In this he is no more original than in his other design of changing the name of the United States to Usland. Miller manages to have himself taken much more seriously in the East and in London than he does at home, where poets are too numerous to attract special attention. He has some foreign admirers who think he is the veritable saint after whom the San Joaquin valley and river have been named.

"Dicky" and the Moon

That industrious purveyor of sentimental tommyrot, the exquisite Mr. Richard Le Gallienne, who pours his soft enchantments into the magazines "in strings of doggerel like sausage meat," has lately been blundering astronomically in rhyme. He calls the effusion "Moonlight." Harken to this poetaster:

"O, climb with me, this April night,
The silver ladder of the moon!
All dew and danger and delight—
Above the poplars soon.

Into the lilac scented sky,
Shall mount her maiden horn,
Frail as a spirit to the eye—
O, climb with me till morn."

A critic, suggesting that Mr. Le Gallienne is hardly on sufficiently familiar terms with the Queen of Heaven's bright isles to take such liberties with her, thus responds to the invitation to climb issued by the bard of the scranne pipe:

Dicky, your "Moonlight" poem is just sweet,
With the "divine afflatus" all replete.
But let me whisper that no mortal eyes,
However eagerly they scanned the skies
In autumn, winter, spring or summer heat,
Have ever yet beheld the new moon rise!

But, Dicky dear, even should not a soul
Accept your invitation to a stroll
Up the long "silver ladder" of the moon,
Don't let the backwardness by others shown
Discourage you from starting up alone—
And, if you've no objection, make it soon!

A Kindly Companion Gone

With the passing of William Maitland, companionably called 'the dean,' the Press Club has lost one of the kindest, best beloved and most genial of its members. Everybody that frequented the rooms knew him intimately and everybody liked to sit beside the ingle-nook with him of an evening to smoke over a sociable glass and browse over the events of the day and the queer things in one's past experience. He had led a rounded and varied life full of strange adventures and replete with sage garnerings. He had served in high places, as when he was high Sheriff of Bombay and had penetrated into many queer places in the Orient while representing a big English house. Some twenty years ago he came to California with what remained of his fortune and bought a vineyard. Like many other Scotchmen of that day he knew very little about the business. The dry years and the vine pests added to his troubles and at last he encountered a period of financial distress. But he faced it pluckily, wrote for the press, tackled the wine problem more vigorously than ever, and after a bit he was on his feet again. Grapes went up in price and with the knowledge he had literally dug out of the ground he was able to reap a comfortable fortune. It was while he was struggling to right his finances that he joined the Press Club and endeared himself by his sincerity, simplicity and companionableness to all its members.

Squeezing the Stock Speculators

Blue, darkly blue and sickly is the hue that hangs over the Mining Stock Exchange on Bush street these days. The several hundred different issues of the Nevada goldfields are sagging downward with a persistency that is heart rending to the margin players facing the situation. A cog slipped somewhere, for this is the very period which was vigorously touted some two months ago as the time when stocks would be soaring, knocking the lid off the record prices. By grace of the powers that be the boom period has been extended another month, so report now officially announce. Meanwhile what is to become of the investors who are having the life blood squeezed out of them in the way of margins. All sorts of soothing syrup reasons are given for the decline, lack of Eastern buyers, lack of big strikes to keep up the public interest, the distressful winter weather that is covering Nevada, the Sullivan failure; in short, any old reason that will mollify the distracted investor will answer the purpose just as well as any of those given. The big insides have formed a combination and when they get ready to move the market they'll do so. Meanwhile they're making money, pounding down prices and gathering in stocks at a cheap figure. Later on they will peddle them out to more gullibles at higher prices and repeat the present squeeze. It's the old, old game played wherever a mining stock board exists: played on a big scale on Wall street; played on a small scale in Oakland.

Playing the Same Old Game

The fact of the matter is that the game on Bush street is being again conducted on the same lines that it was in the thimble rigging Comstock days. The difference now is that with a bigger population, more money in sight and better telegraphic communication

The Severn, at 1050 Geary street, is a delightfully appointed restaurant.

Melba and the Victor

Melba, the most beloved soprano of modern times, sings exclusively for the Victor.

Her twenty-five songs on the Victor are one of the most wonderful achievements in the history of sound recording. All the pure legato style and brilliancy of this wonderful voice is for you today and always—at your home—at your bidding—forever—and still a song costs but the price of a top gallery opera seat.

Here is a list of Melba's Records, any of which can be ordered of us by mail or may be heard at your convenience at our store. It is the perfect living voice—every note, every tone, is there, for the voice of the Victor is the human voice.

It is marvelous, it is wonderful, it is inspiring. No one not having heard a Victor lately has any conception of their perfection or of the developments recently made in Victor records.

"HIS MASTER'S VOICE"

Victors can be purchased by installments if you prefer. They cost from $10 to $100 each for the regular models.

Don't fail to hear the Victor-Victrola—the Victor without a horn—A marvelous invention. Price, $200.00.

Our stock is so complete that disappointment awaits no one—whatever record you want, for whatever machine you possess, come to us and save the trouble of trying to buy where assortments are broken and stocks are small.

east and west, the game is mapped out on a far broader scale. There are now a million shares of stock in play where before there were only one hundred thousand in a company. At par value of one dollar that means that the mine selling at that figure is supposed to be worth one million dollars. How many mines are worth the present good shipping producers. The other two hundred are mostly prospects. Some few of them will make good but the most of them won't by a very, very large majority. And those who speculate in them on glittering advertisement, those who do not carefully investigate the condition of the mine and the character and financial standing of those managing its destiny will surely get their financial fingers burnt, and burnt badly.

Aspects of Genius

It is interesting to contemplate the conflict between great minds. The Rev. Dr. Rader rhapsodizes over Tolstoy, the moralist and the Christian. Mr. G. K. Chesterton, the learned London essayist, has somewhere pointed out that as a moralist the great Russian writer combines in one chaos of contradictions an unmanly Puritan and an uncivilized prig. Moreover he has quoted from Tolstoy's writings to show that his simple life theories are founded on a misconception of Christ's teachings, due entirely to a distortion of Christ's utterances as recorded in the Bible. In other words he has found that Tolstoy the moralist prefers to tell us what Christ taught instead of telling us what Christ said, and that when Tolstoy's assertion of what Christ taught is compared with what the Scriptures tell us that Christ said there is an obvious difference. Nobody disparages Tolstoy the artist, the portrayer of life; for critics all respect his transcendent genius, the essence of which is its universality, but they deplore the didactic Tolstoy, Tolstoy the moralist and Christian who is forever scenting out small sins that are sins only to the mind that has been steeped in sin. This latter Tolstoy is a bore and something of a nuisance. He is narrow and noisy. He is also something of an evil because he inveighs against many of the ideals of family and nation. For example he decries love of country and tries to make us ashamed of certain instincts upon which he has placed a very misleading appraisal; all upon the theory that his impracticable ideals are the essentials of a simple Christian life. It has been said there is more simplicity in the man who eats caviar on impulse than in the man who eats salt on principle, and this dictum embodies a principle of logic upon which may be argued the uncleanness of some of the Tolstoy dogma respecting the family. The influence of the Russian is mischievous because as a moral preacher he is vouchsafed an audience on the strength of his reputation as an artist. And Tolstoy is an artist, one of the world's greatest so far as he employs his skill in giving enduring form to his thought. His genius is at his best when engaged in portraying in noble outlines the dignity of humanity. But as Balzac has said the man who has the most genius does not display it at every instant—he would resemble God too closely. Tolstoy displays his genius when painting with poignant vividness the life of the poor, whose simple diversions from courtship to a glass of ale he would interdict in those moments when his genius nods, when as a venomous reformer he is intent, not like Christ, upon bringing joy into the world but upon making the whole world sad.

The energetic young automobile magnate and one of the leading and most active spirits of the coming automobile show. Mr. Boushey is Chairman of the Show Committee and to him in no small measure will be due the great success which the Exposition is bound to have. Mr. Boushey is comparatively a new comer in the motor field, having entered it some months after the fire. But his training before that event was of a character that enabled him to acquire the qualities essential to success in a business in which competition is keen and stamina is put to the test. For Mr. Boushey was formerly a newspaper man. He has had experience both in the editorial room and the advertising department. After the fire he went East and obtained the agency for the Pope Automobile Co., whose cars up to that time were almost unknown on this Coast, but now seem to be fitting everywhere. The cars shipped to him for exhibition are the same that appeared in the New York show.

that even in the far famed goldfields where they claim to have millions in ore blocked out. In some instances it will easily cost a million dollars to take out and mill a million dollars worth of bullion. There is no gain-saying that there are some good mines in Nevada, some very good ones, but one has fingers enough to count

She Disdains Buggies

Scene: A fashionable grocery store.

Persons: A Parvenu and a Grocery Clerk.

The Grocery Clerk—(Gathering up an armful of bundles containing the groceries ordered by Mrs. Parvenu): Beg pardon, but is that your buggy at the door?

Mrs. Parvenu (drawing herself to her stateliest altitude): That, sir, is my carriage!

To fully appreciate this little comedy from real life the reader must be informed that Mrs. Parvenu is one of the characters in the background of Geraldine Bonner's book entitled "Rich Men's Children." For many years Mrs. Parvenu has dominated the society in which she moves because her husband, now, dead, had money and was a lay figure in the world of finance where he "presided" and "directed" on various "boards" administering the business enterprises of several millionaires. But in the days that Geraldine Bonner writes about in her book Mrs. Parvenu was a boarding-house keeper in Virginia City. She married one of her boarders, as other women mentioned in Miss Bonner's book married the men for whom they washed, and the men for whom they cooked, and the men for whom they sewed on buttons. Out of the bonanza was wafted the good fortune that enabled Mrs. Parvenu to achieve a commanding position in society which she has retained to this day unchallenged and unquestioned. Much of her social success is due to her unrivaled ability as an entertainer. In the jargon of the society reporter, she is a "charming hostess." This success as a "hostess" is probably due in a very great measure to the lady's experience in the boarding-house business. Since her rise to heights of social distinction

Mrs. Parvenu has ceased to ride in "buggies"; she disdains to ride in anything but "carriages." The "buggy" is for the plebian descendants of those who once "boarded" with Mrs. Parvenu. But Mrs. Parvenu seemingly forgot, or perhaps she was never aware, that it is the worst of bad form to leave a "carriage" for the purpose of personally superintending the purchase of groceries. Genuine aristocrats to the manner born sit in their carriages and send the footman to call the clerk. But habit is strong in those who were once accustomed to make the rounds of the butcher, the baker and the grocery dealer for the day's supply of provisions for hungry and not over fastidious boarders.

Jane Klink Honored

Miss Jane Klink, a Berkeley graduate, has been appointed director of the recently organized department of Sociology in the American International College of Springfield, Illinois. Miss Klink has taken a deep interest in sociology for a number of years. She was one of the intrepid band who hired out to do housework in an effort to solve the servant girl problem. The result of her first-hand investigations was published in the Atlantic Monthly, but though they were well written articles which considered the question temperately from both sides, they had no more effect on the situation than the proverbial drop of water on the duck's back. That, however, reflects not in the least on Miss Klink, for it is just as well to admit that the problem is one of individual temperament. There are good mistresses and good servants and when the two come together there is domestic peace and mutual respect. When the incompetent mistress engages the incompetent maid there is chaos, and when either mistress or maid is

Why Should a Doctor Be Called a Captain?

In the United States Navy, as in that of other nations, there is considerable friction between the line officers and the staff officers. The line officers are the fellows who do the harigating and the fighting, while the staff consists of surgeons, paymasters, constructors, engineers and such like. In order to give a better standing to the line officers, they are ranked as lieutenants, commanders, captains or rear-admirals, according to their experience and service. Not content with this, they want to have the titles corresponding to their rank. The controversy between the two divisions of the naval service is an old one and has recently been revived by the personnel bill now under discussion in Congress. To the ordinary observer, who, like Galileo, "cares for none of these things" it seems reasonable that a man should be called by that name or title which gives most information about his occupation. The titles "lieutenant," "commander," "captain," "admiral," seem naturally to indicate the combatant officers; but if surgeons, paymasters, engineers, etc., are to be called by the same titles, the obvious result is confusion. The man who performs the duties of a surgeon or a paymaster should be called a surgeon or a paymaster. Then we know what he is. If he is termed a captain, it is impossible to tell what his functions are.

Temporal and Spiritual Peers

The somewhat interesting and instructive parallel is furnished by the position of the English Bishops. These are spiritual peers and most of them have seats in the House of Lords. Yet the Bishop of Salisbury, for example, is spoken of as Bishop Wordsworth or as the Bishop of Salisbury, not as Lord Salisbury, though he is a lord. To call him Lord Salisbury would confuse him with the temporal Marquis of Salisbury, who in common conversation is referred to as Lord Salisbury. Similarly the Archbishop of York, though he is called "His Grace" and ranks above all Dukes except those of royal blood, is not addressed as the "Duke of York," since this would cause him to be confounded with the royal Duke of York. Quite properly, the spiritual peer is named from his office and see, and the temporal peer, by way of distinction, is termed "Lord." Many of the Bishops hold sees, such as Exeter, St. Albans, Nottingham, Liverpool, Bath, Winchester, Durham, etc., which have also supplied titles to temporal peers, and common sense requires that there should be some easy, convenient way of distinguishing persons so very different in character and occupation as the Bishop of Durham, a scholar, theologian and administrator of one of the greatest episcopal sees in England, and Lord Durham, a Steward of the Jockey Club and noted supporter of the British turf. On the same principle it is reasonable to distinguish between the officers who navigate, fight, set bones, pay wages, preach or perform other functions, equally necessary and honorable, but essentially different.

Baiting the United Railroads

If proof were needed that the daily newspapers of this city wield a power of destruction which far outweighs any constructive force of which they may be possessed, it would be supplied by the riots which took place recently between carmen and passengers of the United Railroads. In two of a particularly serious character which occurred on the same day and almost at the same hour, the platform men and inspectors working for the street car company were fiercely assailed by infuriated mobs which resented their attempts to carry out the perfectly justifiable rules of the company. Their lives were endangered by showers of cobblestones, the windows and sides of the cars were smashed and service on congested lines was delayed interminably during the busiest hour of the evening. In one case the riot followed the attempt of an inspector to remove a passenger who insisted on violating the rule of the company and the city ordinance which forbid riding on the roof of a car. In the second riot the trouble was the outgrowth of the murderous resentment of a crowd of hoodlums who could not stand by inactive and see one of their fellows ejected from a car for insulting women. Rioting is a manifestation of mob spirit wholly alien from San Francisco habits. Our crowds are more than usually disposed toward peace and good humor and on the rare occasions when mob feelings become too exuberant for repression they overflow in the form of rough but harmless pleasantry. Even when subjected to inconvenience, as in the street car strikes, San Franciscans are wont to retain their cheerfulness and good nature. So when we find a crowd on our streets rowing like a pack of frenzied Greeks some other than a purely subjective explanation must be found for the phenomenon. There is such an explanation for these street car riots; they may be traced logically to the incessant attacks on the United Railroads that fill the papers day after day.

Carping Not Justified

The persistent hammering of our journalistic Thors has worked the public into hatred of the United Railroads and its employes which is very far from being justified by the defects of the service. Admitting that street car conditions in this city are aggravating and that improvement seems rather slow, it still must be allowed by all reasonable people that the extraordinary obstacles with which the company has had to contend weigh so heavily in the opposite scale that there is very small ground left for criticism. A street car system networking an entire city cannot be reorganized and its motive power converted in a week or a month. But this consideration is not allowed to influence the policy of our papers which consider constant and unqualified abuse of public-service corporations indispensable to circulation, so they cry down corporate endeavor with all the violence of which the fluent editorial pens are capable. Without being an arrant plutolater one may still insist on a square deal for a corporation which is performing a great public function, to its own exceeding profit of course, but also to the tremendous benefit of the city. If the United Railroads neglects the duties which its intimate relations with the municipality entails, the newspapers are strictly within their rights in calling it to account, but by ill-advised attacks breathing rancor and intemperate hostility no good but much evil is done. By shouting so raucously all the time the papers only deafen their readers to good counsels while they excite featherbrained fools and law-despising hoodlums to riot.

Garibaldi's Interesting Pilgrimage

The effulgent and broadcast notoriety of the present Legislature as a convention of very eminent grafters has aroused the curiosity and perhaps the cupidity of some of the ancient war eagles of the old political parties and they are making rheumatic pilgrimages to the state capital filled with consuming desire to witness the prize grafters' ring at its worst. Among the most picturesque of these resurrected captains of industry is good old Garibaldi Finn, the same old Garibaldi who was one of the district leaders when Bill Higgins was the power in local Republican politics. Sad indeed has been the toboggan slide in life of the faithful Garibaldi since the passing of his mighty chief. He was among the flotsam and jetsam of human wreckage cast into the refugee camps by the big earthquake. Until last week he was among those who lined up daily at the Ingleside camp and marched to their meals. During the recent stormy weather however Garibaldi, like all the rest, kept indoors and found his only solace in the scraps of carefully treasured daily papers that were passed grudgingly from hand to hand. It was in this wise that Garibaldi learned of the exalted merits of the present Legislature as a bunch of artistic grafters and he was seized with an unquenchable fever to see them at their rawest work. The old lieutenant still has a lot of very good friends downtown whom he can call on for favors whenever he deigns to do so. From one he obtained an order for a suit of good clothes, from another he borrowed twenty dollars and started on his pilgrimage to see the tricks of the up-to-date crafty grafter doing his worst. "They'll run you out of town as being the worst of the lot," hazarded one of his friends, jokingly. "Faith, and they won't," replied Finn, confidently. "I know too much about them: they'll not say anything." "Maybe they'll come to you for advice?" Finn winked.

Buckley's Artful Methods

Shortly after 2 o'clock in the morning of the night that Bill Higgins died a Buckley emissary rapped hard on the front door of Finn's house. From an upper window he called down, "What's wanted?" "Word from headquarters, Finn." Garibaldi descended to the door and the messenger continued. "Buckley says to jump into your clothes and come right down and see him." "What for?" "He wants you to throw a district Democratic." "How can I do that? I'm a Republican." Chris says he'll fix that; bustle into your clothes and come along." When Garibaldi reached headquarters Chris met him with the proposition: "Garibaldi, I want you to bring in the umpty umth district Democratic at this coming election." "I can't do it, Chris," was the protest. "I'm a Republican." "Think it over, man. Higgins is dead; the fences are down. There's going to be a new deal all around in framing up the city government and you're a politician. Better get on the band wagon or you'll get left," and he gave him a lot of sage advice on the new combinations among the local powers brought about by the sudden death of Higgins. Garibaldi asked vital questions for five minutes, then he said: "What majority do you expect in the umpty umth district?" "By what majority were you going to carry it for Higgins?" "250." Then I want 250 majority in Democratic votes." "Can't do it," declared Garibaldi, stoutly, "that's flat." "I'll stand for what's right on expense. How many can you deliver?" demanded Buckley. "248." "Well, we'll compromise on 248 then," said Buckley, with a smile. "But say, Garibaldi, if you get a chance, see if in some possible way you can't make it 250."

The Up-to-Date Method

When the returns came in the umpty umth district gave a majority of exactly two hundred and fifty in the Democratic column and great was the struggle among the Nestors of the political press to explain the landslide in the umpty umth district. "It was simple," confessed Garibaldi, long afterwards. "Buckley gave me four hacks; four men to each hack. They did the rest. But they do tell me these up-to-date, brainy workers would only use a messenger boy and bring in a majority of 2,500 while you wait and on any side of the slate. La, la, how times have changed!

Mr. Samuel P. Hamilton, who, since the fire, has had full charge of the gas and electric appliance business of the San Francisco Gas and Electric Company, has been promoted to the very important position of Superintendent of the Contract Department, in connection with which he will continue to manage the appliance business. Mr. Hamilton is one of the most energetic and courteous of quasi-public corporation officials.

Wages, Now and Then

Those who compare the position of workers today with those of centuries back, and draw conclusions very much in favor of twentieth century hogishness, fail entirely in their arguments because they do not know—or with wicked intent ignore—the fact that workers now produce very much more wealth than the workers of old times, and therefore honest reasoning should be on the lines of proportion: What proportion of his productions was the producer of the tenth century allowed to use himself? Did the Biblical penny a day man produce more than "tuppence" worth of wealth? It is not probable that the Jews of those times stole more than half the products of LABOR—civilization however enables both Gentiles and Jews to rob LABOR of about nine-tenths of their products in this twentieth century of Christianity.

Persons who have acquired a quarter million dollars and are still grubbing for more, are much to be pitied; they show dog and hog instincts rather than the love-one-another feelings of higher humanity—if civilize means to humanize, then savages, barbarians—any other term of contempt will do—are more civilized than we are today, for with them the whole tribe suffers want, or together have plenty, one does not feast on the best while others starve, as is the custom under our brand of Christian civilization—the very words leave a bad taste after pronouncing them. A lesson in common sense and brotherhood may be learned from monkeys, for no tribe has yet been found where the mass toil gathering ten cocoanuts, taking nine of them to another monkey—who does nothing but eat—so that they may retain peaceable possession of the remaining one cocoanut for their own use. This is what workers are now doing, and it is compulsory under our unnatural, unjust, wicked standard of all values—souls and bodies no exception—GOLD.

And this standard is upheld by all churches—bankers are usually church buttresses; they understand the game!!!

Motor-Bus for Wireless Wires: Marconi's New Movable Radio-Telegraphic Station

The motor-bus is the design of the Marquis Solari, Signor Marconi's secretary. The motor can be used for traction or for generating electric energy for wireless telegraphy. It is also used for erecting the jointed pole. In ten minutes the station can be made ready for action to its utmost distance, a little over ninety miles; but for small distances it can act while in motion at half speed. The one vehicle carries the pole, the alternator, the apparatus, and staff. It has been patented in the name of Marquis Solari, and although it is intended chiefly for the Italian army, it will be very useful in the case of breakdowns on commercial lines.

Attended a Greenway in Her Nightgown

Those who have never got beyond the mere how-de-do-ness of society have no idea how narrowly the smart set skirts the outer trail of boredom. Certain customs have set and crystallized through the seasons until they have acquired almost the sanctity of a biblical injunction. As a result there is a peculiar inflexibility in social entertainment which robs it of the charm of the unexpected. For example there is an unwritten law that one's best bib and tucker must not appear at the Greenway birthday dinner, but must dazzle the eye at the first of the regular Greenway dances. So it really gave me a thrill to hear that a fun loving young woman who frequently stubs her toe against established conventions actually went to THE Greenway ball in a night gown with a sash tied around her waist.

"Impossible!" the majority will shriek and punctuate their protests with "Why, I was there myself and there isn't a word of truth in it!" But I have the story on the word of the young lady herself, corroborated by the young man who lost the wager and the four witnesses to the challenge. Moreover there is a handsome gold bracelet which could be offered as People's Exhibit A. It all came about in this way: They were discussing the arbitrary sartorial laws of society and the young man insisted that a woman's enjoyment of a function was measured by the glitter of her gown—that a girl had the "time of her life" only when she knew that her dress was the envy of every other woman there. "Nonsense!" exclaimed the young woman. "Why, I could have a good time at a ball if I went in a nightgown and a sash!" Whereupon the young man wagered a handsome gold bracelet that she wouldn't dare do such a thing.

The newspaper descriptions of the gowns worn at that particular ball made mention of the "exquisite white empire gown with entre deux of real Valenciennes lace and knots of gold flowered ribbon." Her friends insist that she deserves a medal as well as a bracelet for only those in the secret could possibly imagine that the upper part of that "exquisite white empire gown" was a beautiful robe de nuit and the full, soft skirt with the "entre deux of real Valenciennes" was a handsome petticoat! The young man took exception to the petticoat as not being in the bargain, but his demurrer was ruled out on technicalities by the witnesses to the wager.

The Progress of a Climber

Once more has a Californian-made fortune opened for its possessor the doors of old-world palaces. But this time it is not a Californian who has gained access to the salons of the European exclusives. The successful climber is none other than that lady of somewhat sensational memory, known to local society as Cornelia Baxter Tevis of Denver, and now Mrs. Hart McKee of Paris. It seems but yesterday that the vivacious young widow of Hugh Tevis was conducting her hopeless campaign in this city for entree to the heterogeneous mob that prides itself on being known as the elect. She was unsophisticated then, for she had only shortly before come out of Denver, and impressed with the affected hauteur of our exclusives, she imagined that Burlingame was about the finest thing in aristocratic settlements that could be found on this earth. Now, if she is not without a sense of humor, the recollection of the emotions that filled her when she aspired to the recognition of the Queens and queenlets of the Greenway routs, must excite her risibles beyond control. The sensation born of that recollection is doubtless akin to that which the man feels when he muses on the ambition of his boyhood to become one of the kings of the earth in the capacity of engineer on a locomotive. For Cornelia Baxter-Tevis-McKee emerged from the purgatory of provincial obscurity to be borne aloft in easy stages to the terrestrial paradise of fashion and gayety where the smallest things have an aristocratic savor and where the varnish of good society imposes no restraint upon the harmonious good-fellowship for which feminine hearts yearn.

Her Dizzy Height

Mrs. Hart McKee has not merely reached those heights in the social world of Paris that are occupied by the titled aristocrats and their satellites. She has reached an eminence far more difficult of access, one from which is reflected the splendor of royal courts. In other words she has attained the fullest social development like a lovely plant in rich soil beneath the caresses of a glorious sun shining in a sky whose azure is never marred by a cloud. This news comes to me straight from the paddock, as they say on the turf, brought by a Californian who has just returned from the French capital and who does not deal in idle social gossip for the press. No backstairs tittle-tattle this of the exalted station attained by the Denver girl who inherited some of the millions left by Lloyd Tevis to enrich his several heirs. The American colony in Paris, says my informant, is filled with girls with green eyes, in consequence of the preeminence of the adventurous lady who miserably failed in her effort to break into that chaste set whose genius sparkles in Mumm. Paris, he says, is the favorite skirmishing ground of the climbers of society and at present the city is filled with rich Americans all making the battle of their lives to get into that charmed circle dominated by Mrs. Astor. In Paris one American eventually meets every other American, and therefore Mrs. Gotrox from Oshkosh or Kalamazoo stands a much better chance of getting into New York society via Paris than by building a mansion on Fifth avenue or a cottage at Newport. It is much easier, says my informant, to get a prince to dine with you than one of the Vanderbilt connection, for the nobility of the continent care nothing about American social distinctions. So long as they can find an American hostess of some sprightliness of manner who has a good chef they care for nothing else.

The Infanta Is Her Chum

Mrs. Hart McKee has a chef who was for years in the service of a Russian Grand Duke, a gentleman whose escapades are known all over the world. With an unlimited fortune behind her and an adoring husband who, according to my informant, seems to be determined that she shall have more diamonds than any woman in Europe, Mrs. McKee is probably the most talked-about woman in Paris. She and the Infanta Eulalie are inseparable. In fact the Infanta cannot be dragged away from Mrs. McKee's side as more than one socially ambitious American has discovered, for many times has she sent her regrets to some brilliant affair that some American was giving, pleading a previous engagement when the engagement referred to was a quiet dinner en famille at the McKee hotel. The impulsive little Infanta further tortures the American climbers by passionately kissing her "dear Cornelia," as she calls her at all times. And further evidence of her affection for Mrs. McKee is to be found in the circumstance that she has invited the lady and her husband to Madrid for the festivities on the occasion of the baptism of the heir to the Spanish throne that the stork promises to bring before many days. So Cornelia will soon be hobnobbing with royalty near the throne and in a fair way to get close up to King Edward through his niece, the Queen of Spain. The Infanta prefers France to Spain as a place of residence and goes to Madrid only when her presence is demanded there on State occasions. Contrary to current gossip that the McKees were on the verge of separation they seem to be like turtle doves. Mrs. McKee has toned down Denver accent and can hold her own linguistically with any member of the American colony.

News of Mrs. Spreckels

From the same Californian who reports the social success of the Tevis widow, I learn that Mrs. Gus Spreckels is now in the midst of the social whirl of Berlin; also, that her daughter Mrs. Spencer Eddy is inclined to be indolent so far as society affairs are concerned, and that Mrs. Spreckels has to prod her to make her keep pace with the leaders of the German capital. The Eddys recently entertained the McCormicks of Paris and the whole party went afterwards to the fancy dress ball given by Mrs. Tower formerly of Oakland. The Crown Prince and Princess were among those present. Mrs. Spreckels, it is said, has become reconciled to her daughter's marriage. Although it was generally styled a most brilliant match, Mrs. Gus Spreckels had higher expectations. "Nothing less than an English Duke will satisfy Orrie," remarked one of her friends shortly before the engagement was announced. Lurline Spreckels Eddy is looking very well again after her recent illness.

The Alexanders

A correspondent writes me from New York that Miss Harriett Alexander, the debutante daughter of Mrs. C. B. Alexander, is one of the most feted of this year's buds. "Mrs. Alexander's house," says my correspondent, "opposite Central Park, is kept ablaze with lights most of the time for she is determined to keep things at a lively pace for this, her daughter's first year out. Musicales are Mrs. Alexander's favorite mode of entertainment and she usually has a Metropolitan Opera singer for one of her guests. Mrs. Alexander's parties more than those of any of the very exclusive set border on the Bohemian. Society at her parties rubs shoulders with more musical artists than are to be found in any other drawing-room in New York. Like her mother, Miss Harriett goes in for intellectual pursuits and is the most brilliant intellectually of any New York debutante in twenty years. She is not a beauty, but is of a frail winsome type that attracts. She is fond of theatricals and recently made a hit in a fairy play given by the Berkeley Lyceum, a swagger club of the younger set of the 400. Mrs. Alexander is in no hurry to make a match for her daughter. She recently said to a friend of mine, 'I want my little daughter with me as long as I can have her,' and there is no doubt that she is sincere."

A Brilliant Young Pianiste

Cecil Cowles, now a slim girl of fourteen, is at the most ungrateful period of her artistic career. She has passed the age of the child wonder, while she has not as yet attained to the full maturity of her powers. She has a wonderful technique and fine intelligence combined with a confidence that at times borders on carelessness. There was a preponderance of Chopin in her programme, although with the exception of the brilliantly executed Rondo she was not at her best with this master. Schumann's plaintive "Warum" and the Moszkowski Waltz marked her highest excellence in two widely different directions. Miss Cowles was programmed for a waltz of her own making dedicated to Dr. Arnold Genthe, and a clever and effective bit of composition it proved to be. On the whole, the young performer did not disappoint the expectations of those who have followed her musical career and with the poise and physical strength to be gained in a few more years there is every reason to predict for her exceptional success. Miss Cowles is a pupil of Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt. Among those that attended the concert were: Mr. and Mrs. James Otis, Mrs. Fred Tallant and daughter, Dr. and Mrs. E. O. Jellinek, Dr. Arnold Genthe, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Speck, Mr. and Mrs. Jessie Lilienthal, Mrs. Leon Sloss, Mr. Albert Elkins, Misses St. John, Miss Fannie Danforth, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Lee, Mr. and Mrs. George Chase, Mrs. Henry Williams, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Simons.

Miss Frances Is Back Again

It is just possible that Frances Joliffe will write a brochure entitled "Near-Travels; or, Almost Seen Through a Car Window." Miss Joliffe returned to San Francisco the other day much to the surprise of her family and friends who thought she was going to spend the coming year or two in Europe. She left for a wander-year just before the earthquake and like so many others parted her trip on the side to hurry back to the stricken city. Just as soon as the doctor had counted San Francisco's pulse and announced that she was well able to sit up and make others take notice, Miss Joliffe set forth again. Every week or two we read in "Among the Californians" column that "Miss Frances Joliffe is still in New York, but expects to sail on the next steamer for Europe." But Frances suddenly changed her mind and came home instead. I hear that she will do dramatic criticism and fashions for the Bulletin. The travel germ is evidently not entirely eradicated from the family, for Mary Joliffe leaves in a few days for New York and she will then lose the distinction of being one of the few society girls who have never been East. Mary Joliffe hates to travel and until this recent determination to see a bit of the world nothing could induce her to cross the continent. She will visit Alice Doubleday and other New York friends and is even contemplating crossing the pond in the spring. So it is evident that when travelingitis really sets in it takes more than a little dose of carsickness to cure it.

Among the recent arrivals at Byron Hot Springs are Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Davenport, Mr. and Mrs. Lovejoy King, Rev. T. R. Lynch, Mrs. G. X. Wendling, Miss Florence Wendling, Mrs. C. E. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Hewlett, Louis Hammersmith, of San Francisco; J. L. Gould, Alameda; Dr. and Mrs. J. D. Davidson, Fresno.

A Letter From Miss Winship

In a letter written to a friend here Mrs. Emory Winship says the report that she has Gotham social ambitions is the apogee of absurdity. As a matter of fact the Winships did not find New York to their taste and have left for the South. Lieutenant Winship is a Southerner and is very anxious to renew his boyhood acquaintances. At the time of Miss Dillon's marriage to the young naval officer it was remarked that most of her bridesmaids were members of the old Southern families, a set with which Miss Dillon had never particularly affiliated. In fact Miss Collier, who was one of the attendants, had scarcely a speaking acquaintance with the bride two months before the wedding. But Miss Dillon had adopted the precepts of Ruth and with a "thy people shall be my people" determination cultivated old friends of the Winship family. Miss Patricia Cosgrave who has been Miss Winship's companion for many years has been visiting her brother "Jack" Cosgrave, whose brilliant success as the editor of Everybody's Magazine adds another leaf to California's laurel wreath. Miss Cosgrave is now with the Winships in the South.

Protracted Engagements the Rule

On all sides one hears the cling-clang of the anvil chorus and most of the knocks are directed at Cupid who is held responsible for a season singularly unsuccessful in the matter of engagements. In justice to Dan it must be said that long engagements seem to be the fashion now and so it is really impossible to check up his work for the season as much of the data is held in strictest secrecy. Last year it was considered correct to take all the world into your confidence at once and then have the wedding trip blithely on the heels of the engagement announcement. But this season's engaged girls evidently like suspense—with the exception of Pearl Landers, who became Mrs. Vincent Whitney in a jiffy. Anita Harvey, Charlotte Wilson and Jane Wilshire have all preferred the perquisites of "an engaged girl." Among the "suspects" not yet properly tagged is Maude Bourn in whom a young Englishman, who visited here, seemed to take a deal of interest. Miss Bourn has not taken an active part in the winter festivities as her health has not been very robust. She has recently taken the rest cure and is now able to drive around town but still shows an "interesting" pallor. Miss Bourn is a very independent young woman who singles out few girls for close friendship. Her most intimate friend was Gertrude Eels, now Mrs. "Jack" Babcock, whose husband resigned from the navy to go into business in Milwaukee. Miss Bourn, I hear, gave her chum some shares in her father's mine, which pay handsome dividends. One or two other girls have also been favored by her generosity.

Gossip From Del Monte

My Monterey correspondent writes: There is a social ebb and high tide for those in the swim, and just now a coterie at Del Monte is in the midst of much entertaining. A few weeks ago Miss Morgan gave a luncheon in honor of Mrs. Charles H. Poor, who is visiting her daughter, the wife of Colonel Maus, in command of the Monterey Presidio. One of the charming features of this luncheon was that the good things to eat were served on the historic silver of the Low family. Among the guests were those who, while having lost many of their treasures in the flames of last April, are still the happy possessors of beautiful plate that had been safely stored. In the last week a number of affairs have been given with Mrs. Poor and Mrs. Maus as the guests of honor, and at these functions in private dining-rooms has shone the heirlooms so dear to feminine hearts. * * * Mrs. Harry Gray and Miss M. ### The Most Picturesque of the Artists

To the guests at Del Monte the popular and amiable Xavier Martinez was the star actor in the company of artists. One lady exclaimed: "He must be a genius to look like that!" Martinez did not wear his corduroys, nor a velvet suit, much to the regret of those who had heard but not seen, but he did have on his red necktie and his flowing locks. To Maynard Dixon he was heard to say that he would have had his hair cut had he realized how sumptuous would be the surroundings. But the question is, how much would he have sacrificed had he permitted a barber to touch those treasured tresses?

The St. John Musicale

A most delightful afternoon of music was given last Sunday by the Misses Grace and Geraldine St. John at their residence. These attractive young girls are daughters of R. A. St. John, prominently identified with the Hibernia Bank of this city, and are but recently graduated from the College of Notre Dame. Both are talented pianists, and the two hundred or more friends who listened to them on Sunday were quite carried away by the charm of their playing. Miss Grace's numbers were Grieg's Poetic Tone Pictures and Carneval, the latter being given a splendid rendition, graceful and spirited with much brilliancy toward the end. Two novelties by Sjoegren were enjoyable, also the C minor Etude of Chopin and Moskowski's Etincelles. The Moskowski number was taken at a fine speed and was exceedingly well played. Miss Geraldine's numbers included the Chopin C minor Polonaise, beautifully interpreted, a Poldini Etude, Liszt Heroide Elegioque, Rubinstein F minor Barcarolle, Grieg Auf den Berzen, and closed with the big A flat Polonaise of Chopin, of which the dainty fair-haired girl gave a really fine performance, displaying unexpected power in the difficult octave crescendo. Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt, whose pupils they are, expressed himself as highly gratified by their success. The large drawing-room, reception hall and dining-room were tastefully decorated with masses of carnations, violets, lilies of the valley, etc., sent by friends to the gifted sisters, and a bevy of pretty girls acted as reception committee. Dainty refreshments were the final note of the enjoyable occasion.

Miss Eleanor Davenport was the hostess at a very delightful luncheon last Friday at The Severn. Among those who enjoyed Miss Davenport's hospitality were Mrs. Danforth Boardman, Mrs. Alexander Keyes and Mrs. E. E. Brownell.

Gossip From Los Angeles

My Los Angeles correspondent writes: The presence of a large number of interesting visitors from the East has been the motive for much pleasant entertaining during the last few months. Among the visitors who have been recently complimented are Mrs. J. E. Woolwine and Miss Woolwine, who are visiting the W. D. Woolwines. Misses Faith Ingraham and Hilda Peck who are the guests of their uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Ingraham, and Miss Margaret Benedict of Chicago who is the guest of the Godfrey Holterhoffs. The days immediately preceding Lent were filled with teas, receptions and luncheons in honor of these visitors while several important weddings, notably those of Louise McFarland and Leo Chandler and Margaret Lee and Roy Koster have engaged the attention of society for the last week. February 12 was the date named for the last of the series of Assembly dances and the conventional costume for the evening was the traditional Mardi Gras fancy dress. Masks were worn during the early part of the evening. * * * In honor of the first little granddaughter Mrs. W. W. Neuer entertained with a novel luncheon last week. Mrs. Ralph Heath of Portland is the mother of the little newcomer whose advent was celebrated by Mrs. Neuer in the company of quite a gathering of women friends. A coverlet of pink silk covered the table and each bit of quilting yarn held a tiny pink rosebud and a small lighted taper. In the center of the table perched a solemn-looking stork bearing a dimpled babe. The menu was served in baby dishes and the ice cream was moulded in the form of basket babies. Rattles and other articles suggestive of the child's world were scattered over the cloth. The Heaths were in Los Angeles a year ago when they were much entertained. * * * The wealthy Bradbury family, whose survivors are Mrs. J. W. Winston, Mrs. I. H. Polk, Misses Louise and Simona Bradbury, John, Joseph and Lewis Bradbury, has donated to the Church of the Immaculate Conception at Monrovia a $4,000 altar of fine Italian marble which will soon be placed by a Boston contractor. The gift is in remembrance of the donors' parents.

A Runaway Ring

It was certainly rather rough on the Rev. Reginald Bisgood that by an act of the purest good-nature on his own part he should have been led into so awkward and distressing a complication.

If anything, he should have been rewarded for his kindness; but, in point of fact, he was severely penalized. However, such is not infrequently the case when we go out of our way to be kind to unworthy persons, and the person to whom the Rev. Reginald Bisgood went out of his way to be kind proved to be most unquestionably of that character.

A very small person it was, too. In fact, a little limb of a boy just five years old. And this is how it was.

The Rev. Reginald had just recently accepted the post of curate at St. Matthew's Church, Tootham, under the Rev. Jeremy Priggleswade, Vicar of that parish. Now a thoroughly typical specimen was this vicar of what may be called conventional piety. No man could have lived more strictly up to the smug standard of moral and social rectitude which obtains among the wealthy and respectable middle-classes of a prosperous country town—that standard which finds a royal road to Heaven, in black-coated and top-hatted propriety, a rigid observance of the letter of the ten commandments, and a righteous abhorrence of Bohemianism in any shape.

The Vicar of St. Matthew's expected to get to Heaven by this means. Incidentally, he also expected a more immediate reward—a desirable piece of worldly preferment, on the way. The very desirable living of St. Peter's, Tootham, the mother parish of the town, had just fallen vacant by the resignation of the Rector. The Rector, being a very old man, his reverend brother of St. Matthew's had for some time past taken the lead in ecclesiastical affairs in Tootham. The Vicar of St. Matthew's had, in fact, long looked upon himself as the future rector of Tootham, and when the old Rector resigned he lost no time in forwarding to the patron an application for the vacant living, accompanied by a sheaf of testimonials from several scores of influential parishioners.

That he should obtain his request he felt tolerably confident, since Mr. Jenkins, the patron of the living, although an absentee who never came near the place (being entirely given up to social life in London), had nevertheless always shown a laudable disposition to fall in with the wishes of the parishioners. At the time when his new curate, Mr. Bisgood, arrived Mr. Piggleswade was still awaiting the answer to his application.

And now for the little episode at which I hinted at the outset.

The new Curate was strolling one morning down one of the residential streets in the town when he saw a very small boy making heroic but vain attempts to reach the big brass handle of one of the front-door bells. Our good-natured young parson at once went to the child's assistance.

"Hello, my little fellow! Can't reach it, eh? Well, let me ring the bell for you." And, suiting the action to the word, he gave the handle a mighty tug, which set the bell clanging loudly within.

A smile of huge gratification expanded the chubby face of the graceless urchin.

"Now we must cut and run," he lisped. And he was off, like a rabbit scuttling to earth, leaving the astonished and dismayed Curate alone upon the door-step. The imp had evidently been simply amusing himself with the small boys' favorite pastime of runaway rings.

Before the Curate had time to recover from the shocks, the door was opened by a rather flustered-looking maid-servant.

"I—I—ahem! Does—does—Mrs.—Mrs. Robinson live here?" he stammered, mentioning the first name that came into his head, as the best way out of the embarrassing situation in which that mischievous little joker had landed him. But, alas! this device, so far from proving a way out, had the directly opposite result, for, to his intense amazement and dismay, the maid answered:

"Yes, sir. Will you please walk in, sir?"

The Curate was so taken aback, that he complied, and before he knew where he was, found himself standing in the hall.

"What name shall I say, sir?" inquired the maid.

The Curate stammered out his name; the maid showed him into a well-furnished drawing-room, and then went to fetch her mistress. While she was gone, Mr. Bisgood stood on the hearthrug feeling very embarrassed, and trying to evolve some plausible explanation of his visit.

If the house had been in St. Matthew's parish, he might have carried things off easily and naturally enough by pretending that he had called to see the lady in the ordinary course of his professional ministrations. But the house was not in St. Matthew's parish; it was in the parish of St. Peter's; so he could scarcely put forward that pretext. And yet he must say something—and, well, perhaps, after all, as a new arrival in the town he might not unreasonably plead ignorance of parochial boundaries, and—

At that moment the lady of the house appeared. She was youngish, and decidedly pretty and attractive, though perhaps somewhat over-dressed. She bowed to Mr. Bisgood with entire self-possession. He returned the bow.

"Mrs. Robinson?" he murmured, awkwardly.

She smiled and nodded, then looked at him interrogatively, as though inviting him to state the object of his visit.

"I'm the—the—new curate," he began, "and I thought that, as I was passing——"

"Quite so. Pray be seated," interposed the lady, taking a chair herself, and indicating an adjacent ottoman to her visitor. "Very kind of you to call, I'm sure. Do you know, I've been here three months, and you are the first clergyman who has been to see me?"

At this statement the Rev. Reginald expressed much surprise. He felt it, too. A rather susceptible young man himself, he knew that he should certainly not have neglected to call, with proper frequency, on so fair a parishioner, and he wondered why the other clergy in the town had been so backward.

"I don't know how it is," continued Mrs. Robinson, candidly, "but I'm afraid I can't be exactly persona grata in Tootham. Everybody seems to fight shy of me. I'm not aware of having done anything to offend the worthy denizens of this highly respectable place. But such is the fact. I seem to be regarded as a sort of social leper. However, we won't talk about that. Let's talk about something pleasanter and more interesting."

And she at once led the conversation into impersonal channels. She was a good talker in addition to being a very pretty woman, and the Rev. Reginald found her society so

Fitch Says He's No Dude

The Theatrical Press agents of New York gave a dinner in honor of Clyde Fitch the other night. Mr. Fitch was called on for a speech.

"Only two or three times since I began to write for the stage eighteen years ago," said Mr. Fitch, "have I attended a public dinner. I never wanted to do so until tonight, and I am very glad to be here among a body of men who do not talk buncombe. [Uncertain applause.] This is the sweetest and happiest honor I have experienced during those eighteen years. There is no class so lovable as the press representatives. Their worst knock is to say, perhaps, 'That damn So-and-So gets more in the papers than I do.' I'm a queer man," continued Mr. Fitch, with growing sincerity of tone. "I'm straight and sincere, and the reason I don't go to public dinners is that I do not want to be with men who will praise me to my face and damn me behind my back. But here I am with real friends. [Hoor-a-ay!] In my work for the theatre I am sincere. I am called a dude, a flippant. I am not a dude, a flippant! and I'll say what I have to say here and never take it back.

During my eighteen years of work I admit I've tried always, always, to make a good play. Among the forty-four plays I've written I've had four flat failures, with all the bands playing. But I am not one of your Mrs. Winslow dramatists, I am not restful. In this world the thing to do is to fight. To die fighting is the game I like. The press agent is the best of all critics, and I always take his word first. He is in touch with the public and the press and he doesn't think he can write your play for you better than you can. I thank you, gentlemen. If I am ever asked who I want to write my epitaph I shall answer, 'A press agent.'" [Distressing applause.]

Wilton Lackaye said when called out on the carpet that Mr. Fitch's "sincere heart talk" made the usual after dinner speech look ridiculous. Next to actors, thought Mr. Lackaye, the press agents are the best ever. The presence of the actor folk and playwrights at a press agent dinner reminded him of a story about a Maine farmer who was exhibiting a moose in a tent. A countryman came to see the show with his family and was about to pay 25 cents a ticket for each of his children, when the moose exhibitor learned that there were sixteen children altogether.

"You may all go in free," said the show owner promptly.

"Why?" asked the farmer in surprise.

Isabelle Fletcher.

The unusually clever work shown by Miss Fletcher, the leading woman of Manager Harry Bishop's Ye Liberty Playhouse stock in Oakland has attracted attention on both sides of the bay. Miss Fletcher is an experienced actress, with decided temperament and power in delineation. An idea of her versatility is shown in the widely dissimilar portrayals demanded by Pauline, in "The Lady of Lyons," Roma, in "The Eternal City"; Duleie Larrondie in "The Masqueraders," and Bernice Gordon, in Harry Cottrell's most recent success, "Before the Gringos Came." In all these Miss Fletcher has been tremendously successful. Her tasteful and lavish dressing parts, too, has occasioned comment and proclaimed her as the best dresser the East has contributed to the Western stage.

"Because," answered the showman, "it is quite as important that my moose should see your family as that you should see the moose."

The press agents, conclude Mr. Lackaye, could make their own application.

"The Contrapuntal Differences Between the Fitch Dramas and the Pollock Plays" was responded to by Channing Leon Larkin Pollock. There are two chief differences, he said—quality and quantity. Mr. Pollock told that when the late Roland Reed was operated on in St. Luke's Hospital he was placed upon the operating table in the clinic room, from which the medical students had been excluded for the time being. Just as the ether cone was about to be placed over the actor's nose, he rolled his eyes up and down the long tiers of empty benches around the operating table.

"Doctor," he said, "you may be a good surgeon, but you've got a damn poor press agent."

Salome at the Colonial

Next week the San Francisco public will have an opportunity of witnessing Oscar Wilde's greatest and most artistic triumph, "Salome." This fascinating one-act tragedy will be staged for the first time in this city Monday night, when the Colonial Theatre Stock Company will present it. "Salome" has caused more comment in all parts of the civilized world than any drama that has ever before been produced. While it is not generally known, Oscar Wilde originally wrote "Salome" in French for Sarah Bernhardt. Since then it has been translated into many languages, the best English version being by Lord Alfred Douglas. No play is as popular or draws more fashionable audiences in Germany than "Salome," where Wilde's works are highly thought of, while Julia Marlowe has scored a most profound sensation in the piece wherever she has presented it. It may truthfully be said that the production of "Salome" will be the dramatic event of the season. Manager Kurtzig states that the play will be put on at the Colonial in the most painstaking manner, no detail whatever being omitted, and that an all-star cast will be utilized in its presentation. He also promises a sensation in the line of scenic effects. "Lend Me Five Shillings," the delightful comedy in which the late Joe Jefferson starred with such success, will precede "Salome." This grand double bill should prove a decided attraction at the cozy Colonial, which has won a place for itself in the hearts of stock devotees by the high-class nature of the productions put on by the management. The original Mother Goose Company will give a special matinee performance of "Mother Goose" at the Colonial theatre on the afternoon of Friday, February 22.

The Rosenthal Concerts

Musical circles both here and across the bay are anxiously awaiting the appearances of Moritz Rosenthal, in some respects the most marvelous pianist living and one who possesses individuality in the highest degree. In technic this artist has no rival and at the same time his interpretations of the simplest numbers is most charming. Above and over all is a strong mentality. Rosenthal is as great as a musician as he is as a piano virtuoso. So great is the demand for seats that Manager Greenbaum has arranged to give a concert in addition to the two originally announced. The dates will be Thursday evening, February 28 (his only evening concert) and Saturday and Sunday afternoons, March 2 and 3, and the place selected is Christian Science Hall, corner Sacramento and Scott streets. The programmes will be exceptionally interesting and will include Beethoven's sonates Op. 109 and Op. 57, Chopin's sonates, Op. 58 and Op. 35, Schumann's "Carnevale," Brahms' variations on a Paganini theme, groups of Chopin works and "Pappilions," "Humoresque and Fugato" on themes by Johann Strauss and Fantasie on "The Blue Danube" by Rosenthal. The prices will be $2.00, $1.50 and $1.00 and seats will be on sale next Saturday morning, February 23, at Kohler & Chase's, corner Franklin and Sutter, and also at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, on Van Ness just above California, where complete programmes may be obtained. Mail orders addressed to Will L. Greenbaum may be sent to either box office but to receive attention must have money order or check enclosed. On Friday, March 1, Rosenthal will appear as soloist with the University Orchestra at the Greek Theatre, Berkeley, on which occasion he will play the Chopin Concerto in E minor and the Liszt Concerto in E flat with orchestral accompaniment. This is the first time in many years that we have had an opportunity of hearing great concertos played in their original form. Seats for the Greek Theatre will be sold at the box offices mentioned and at the same prices.

Mr. and Mrs. Petschnikoff, violinists, will appear here early in April in some novel concerts. Rarely heard

Evans Is Coming

The bill at the Orpheum for next week will be one of the most novel and delightful in the annals of vaudeville. Charles E. Evans, the famous comedian of Evans and Hoey "Parlor Match" fame, who is now making his first vaudeville tour, will appear in a one-act farce by George Arliss entitled "It's Up to You William." Mr. Evans will have the assistance of his own company, which includes Elizabeth Barry, Helena Phillips, Louise Skillman and Charles H. Hopper. The other new artists are: "The Four Rianos," animal actors, grotesque acrobats and pantomimists, who are peerless in their peculiar line; Cameron and Flanagan, in their original act "On and Off," a behind the scenes skit in which the fun is fast and furious; Allan Shaw, the world's greatest palmist and coin and card manipulator; Shields and Rogers, in their exhibition of lassoing, rope throwing and twirling, and Eleanor Falke, the dainty singing comedienne. The marvelous Bedouin Arabs, Nellie Beaumont and company, the Lasky-Rolf Quintette and new Motion Pictures will also participate in the entertainment. The success of the daily matinees is so great that it has been wisely concluded to make them permanent.

A Playwright's Favorite Theme

As usual the most successful play of the season in New York came from England. It is Henry Arthur Jones' "The Hypocrites." Jones is never so happy as when dealing with shams and hypocrisy. He has played all the strings of the theme and has made us thoroughly familiar with his method in "Saints and Sinners" and "The Whitewashing of Julia." The Keynote of "The Hypocrites" is sounded by one of the characters in this speech: "My dear Linnell, you aren't a baby; you're an educated man. Open your eyes! Look at the world around you, the world we've got to live in, the world we've got to make our bread and cheese in! Look at society! What is it? An organized hypocrisy everywhere. We all live by taking each other's dirty linen, and pretending to wash it; by cashing each other's dirty little lies and shams, and passing them on. Civilization means rottenness, when you get to the core of it. It's rotten everywhere. And I fancy it's rather more rotten in this dirty little hole than anywhere else."

American Theatre

The Kirke La Shelle-Julian Edwards romantic comic opera, "The Princess Chic," has proved a most attractive offering at the American Theatre, and the few remaining performances to be given promise to be fully as profitable as the preceding ones. Excellent work is being done by the San Francisco Opera Company in this thoroughly tuneful and brilliant opera. Aida Hemmi has scored one of the greatest hits of her local career in the role of the Princess, while the other principal roles are artistically done. The coming Sunday night will terminate the run of "The Princess Chic," and on Monday night a mammoth production of Alice Neilson's striking comic opera success, "The Singing Girl," will be substituted. The book of "The Singing Girl" is by Harry B. Smith, the libretto by

The Virginian

"The Virginian" has scored a triumph at the Novelty Theatre, where it is being presented by Dustin Farnum and a particularly strong cast. Seats have been in such a demand as to call for an extra performance on Sunday afternoon in addition to the regular Saturday matinee. Mr. Farnum has made a fine personal hit in the role of the Virginian and is even more popular now than when he first essayed the role in this city at the Columbia Theatre. Frank Campeau as the treacherous cattle-thief, Trampas, gives a star performance and Mabel Wright is exceptionally pleasing in the leading feminine role.

Maude Adams in "Peter Pan" will be seen here shortly.

Raymond Hitchcock will not only appear in "The Galloper" during his engagement at the Novelty Theatre, but will also present a new piece, the initial performance of which is scheduled for this month at Washington.

Scene From the One-Act Farce "It's Up to You William" Which Charles E. Evans of Evans and Hoey "Parlor Match Fame" and His Company Will Present Next Week at the Orpheum

Creston Clarke in his new production, "The Ragged Messenger," is to follow "The Virginian" at the Novelty Theatre. Clarke will be pleasantly remembered by his performance in the title role of "Monsieur Beaucaire."

Dustin Farnum of "The Virginian" company is a great automobile enthusiast and is seen about town in his big car which he carries about the country.

"Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" will pay San Francisco a visit in the near future. She was a popular success at the Columbia Theatre two years ago.

Owing to the immense demand for seats there will be an extra matinee of "The Virginian" at the Novelty Theatre on Sunday afternoon as well as on Washington's Birthday and Saturdays.

The famous comedians, Murray and Mack, in their newest success "Around the Town," are to play a special engagement at the Novelty Theatre in the near future. They are supported by a large company of musical comedy people.

Nance O'Neil, the distinguished tragedienne, is the owner of a ring which was formerly worn by the ill-fated Marie Antoinette. The brilliants are set in a silver mounting on blue enamel, which the jewelers say is a lost art. The gowns which Miss O'Neil wears in "The Sorceress" are wonderful creations by Lucille, of London, the world famous modiste and some incredibly rich specimens of Egyptian embroidery.

The first American actress who ever appeared at the Khedival Grand Theatre in Cairo, Egypt, was Nance O'Neil, who will be seen here in "Magda," the same play which was offered for the opening bill in Cairo. The Khedive himself was present at the opening performance, as was Lord and Lady Cromer. Miss O'Neil spent her vacation near the Pyramids, and has the distinction of being the only American woman who ever ascended the pyramids of Cheops, 240 feet high, and she is proud of the distinction.

Creston Clarke, in "The Ragged Messenger," will soon be seen here. This is the play which the New York critics declared would live long after "The Christian" had been forgotten. Its leading character, John Morton, is a clergyman, whose philanthropic ideas lead to his being dubbed "The mad parson."

agreeable, that he prolonged his visit rather unduly. Indeed, when he took his leave, he was surprised to find that he had been there for more than an hour.

Now, as it happened, his visit to Mrs. Robinson, and the length of time he had remained there, had not escaped the lynx-eyes of a certain highly respectable maiden lady who lived just over the way. This was Miss Letitia Partlett, a veritable dragon of propriety and self-constituted guardian of the morals of Tootham. Before the day was out she put on her best cloak and bonnet—latest examples of the style of the year before last—and flew round to St. Matthew's Vicarage, where she had a long private interview with the Vicar. The result of this interview was, that when the Curate went next morning for his day's instructions, he found himself greeted by his superior in the sternest and most frigid of tones.

"Come in here, if you please, Mr. Bisgood," said the Vicar, leading the way into his study. "I have something very unpleasant to discuss with you."

The Curate, not conscious of any particular delinquency, wondered what on earth was up. He was soon enlightened.

"Be good enough to explain to me," demanded the Vicar, very stern, righteous, and scathing, "how it is that you were seen to go into the house of that bad woman yesterday, and to remain with her for an hour and sixteen minutes?"

"Eh? Bad woman? What on earth do you mean? To whom are you referring?" cried out the Curate, in unaffected astonishment and indignation.

"Don't pretend ignorance, sir. You know very well," retorted the Vicar, witheringly. "Whom should I mean but that abandoned creature who calls herself Mrs. Robinson—a woman whose name is a by-word in the town, and whose house no self-respecting person would be seen to enter—much less a minister of the Gospel, like yourself?"

The Curate looked as he felt, very much taken aback. Mrs. Robinson a bad character? Impossible! That she was a vivacious little woman and prone to flirtation had been obvious enough to him during their one hour's agreeable tete-a-tete. But that there was anything seriously amiss with her he could scarcely believe. She had not struck him as at all that sort of person.

"I did happen to go and see a Mrs. Robinson yesterday, under rather peculiar circumstances—" he answered.

"Very peculiar, I have no doubt," interposed the Vicar, with biting sarcasm.

"My calling upon her, however, was the purest of accidents——"

"Oh! of course," said the Vicar, more and more sarcastic.

"I beg you will do me the justice of hearing me out," rejoined the Curate, his color rising. "The circumstances which resulted in my visiting this Mrs. Robinson were as follows." And he told the Vicar the exact circumstances, not omitting any detail.

The Vicar listened with an air of offensive incredulity, now and then shrugging his shoulders as much as to say, "Do you really think it worth while taking the trouble to tell me all these lies?"

When the Curate had quite done, he retorted, scoffingly:—

"A very pretty and ingenious story, Mr. Bisgood. I really don't know which to commend the more—your ingenuity in concocting it, or your effrontery in telling it."

"Do you mean to say you don't believe me?" demanded the Curate, beginning to grow heated.

The Vicar laughed a peculiarly nasty laugh,

"I wasn't born yesterday," he said; "and even if I had been, I should still have thought your story rather thin—" especially your hitting on the woman's name accidentally, without any previous knowledge of her. That was so exceedingly likely, wasn't it?"

"Robinson is a common enough name. And, likely or not, it is precisely what happened," answered the Curate, now very indignant indeed.

"Oh! So that is all you have to say?" remarked the Vicar, dryly.

"No, it is not quite all," retorted the Curate, "I have also to say that—even assuming Mrs. Robinson's character to be what you imply—I could not possibly have known anything about it; for, until I saw her yesterday, I had never so much as heard of the woman."

Again the Vicar laughed his nasty scoffing laugh—a laugh that made it difficult for the Curate to refrain from kicking him.

"You must have heard of so notorious a person," he said. "A woman who is constantly visited on Sundays by flashy acquaintances—mostly men—in motor-cars, and who entertains them into the small hours with music and feasting and revelling. Why, Sir, the goings on in that Jezebel's house are the talk of the town. And you expect me to believe that you had never heard of her. No! no! Mr. Bisgood. Try that story on somebody a few years younger than I am."

The Curate was by this time—not unnaturally—in a white heat of passion.

"You're the first man who has ever dared to call me a liar; and by Heaven, I've a good mind to thrash you for the insult, you—you—smug Pharisee!" he cried, in a voice that trembled with perhaps excusable rage.

The Vicar, though endeavoring to sustain a calm, dignified, and contemptuous air, slipped rather hastily round to the other side of his study table, so as to interpose that solid piece of furniture between himself and his Curate. He was not a warrior, except linguistically, and he entertained a wholesome regard for his own skin. Thus entrenched behind four foot of mahogany, he said:—

"You are not improving your position by insolence and blasphemy, Mr. Bisgood. Had you been penitent and contrite, I might have given you another chance. But, in view of the outrageous manner in which you have taken my rebuke, the sooner you leave Tootham, the better."

"I'll go today," ejaculated the Curate.

"A wise resolve," rejoined the Vicar. "And—by the way—do not refer to me for a testimonial."

"I would not take a testimonial from you as a gift," answered the Curate.

"You will not have the chance," retorted the Vicar. "And, of course, it will be my duty to report your conduct to the Bishop."

"I hope you will," exclaimed the Curate. "The Bishop, by all accounts, has some Christian charity, and is not altogether destitute of the feelings of a gentleman." And with that Partisan shaft, steeped in venomous implication, he took his departure.

The pious Vicar was so much upset by the outrageous behavior of his curate, that it was some days before he recovered his equanimity. However, an encouraging letter from the patron of the living of St. Peter's, which the Vicar received on the third day after the Curate's departure, did much to soothe his ruffled feelings. The letter ran as follows:

"Dear Sir,—Your application for the living of Tootham has been sent on to me by Mr. Jenkins, the gentleman from whom I purchased the advowson some months ago.

"Will you, if possible, make it convenient to call on me here the day after tomorrow—any time between two and six in the afternoon—and we can then discuss the matter.—I am, yours faithfully,

M. de Bracey."

"1,001, Eaton-square, S. W., Jan. 15, 19—."

You may be sure the Vicar lost no time in writing to say that he would, with pleasure, run up to town next day and see Mr. de Bracey, as requested. He saw himself already rector of Tootham. It seemed tolerably certain that the new patron would not have sent for him, unless he had serious thoughts of presenting him to the benefice.

When he arrived next afternoon at 1,001 Eaton-square, he asked the butler whether Mr. de Bracey was at home.

"Mrs. de Bracey, sir," the butler corrected him. "There is no Mr. de Bracey; my master has been dead some years. Yes, sir, the mistress is at home. She is expecting you, I think. Mr. Priggleswade, is it not? Will you walk in, please?"

The Vicar walked in, and was shown into the library, where the lady of the house, who was writing at her escritoire, rose to receive him.

The Vicar started. He turned pale. In the pretty woman who stood confronting him he recognized that depraved person, Mrs. Robinson.

"I—I—came to see Mrs. de Bracey," he stammered.

"And I am Mrs. de Bracey," she smiled. "You are surprised, eh?—because you have known me in another name. Well, the fact is this: When I purchased the advowson of Tootham with the knowledge that the late rector contemplated resigning at an early date, the idea struck me that I would come down to the place and live there awhile, in an assumed name, so that I might have a good opportunity of studying and sizing up the local clergy, with a view to seeing whether any of them were deserving to be appointed to the benefice, when it fell vacant."

She paused. The Vicar looked rather blank. He wished now that he had not been quite so hasty in his judgment of Mrs. "Robinson's" character. Further, he hoped, with all his heart, that she had not heard of that little row he had had with his Curate in connection with the latter's visit to her house.

The lady went on:—

"My rather Bohemian way of life appears to have shocked all the good people of Tootham immensely; and I won't deny that, when I saw that, I took something of a malicious pleasure in even going out of my way to shock them further. Still, I hardly think that they—least of all you clergy, who are supposed to be especially endowed with the virtue of Christian charity—need have jumped to the conclusion that I was a bad character."

"Oh, I never thought that—" began the Vicar, in obsequious deprecation.

"No?" she ejaculated, with a slight lift of her shapely shoulders. "Then I wonder why you dismissed that nice curate of yours for the iniquity of merely calling to see me."

"Oh, that was a mistake—an unfortunate mistake—"

"A very unfortunate mistake, Mr. Priggleswade, as you are now to learn. Had you behaved differently, and as a minister of the Gospel ought, I should probably have presented you to the benefice. But, as it is, I have decided to present your late curate, the Rev. Reginald Bisgood."

—The Curate.

The Linz Sanborn Auto Company is one of the largest automobile dealers on the coast, and although young in business, is disposing of a great number of St. Louis and Maxwell automobiles, having delivered 44 since November 8, a record of which can be seen at their office. The St. Louis is becoming famous as a touring car, and orders are being booked daily. They will exhibit their lines at the automobile show, to be held February 18 to 25. Space No. 36.

Diamond Tires

They were on top, of course, at the Madison Square Garden Show. There were one hundred and seventeen per cent more Diamond Tires on cars exhibited than the next highest make and as many as the next four leading American makes. There were one hundred and ninety-six per cent more Diamond Tires than the highest foreign make of tires. At the Palace Show and the Philadelphia Show they more than confirmed the record of last year, when statistics show that for the twelve months ending September 1, 1906, thirty-three per cent of all the tires sold in America were Diamond Tires, two hundred per cent gain being made during the last five months of the year. The Diamond Tires more than ever lead all other makes.

Six thousand miles at a total repair expense of 90 cents (the cost of an oiler ratchet) is the record made the past season by the Winton Model K owned by Mr. J. H. White of Meriden, Conn. "Wonderfully reliable at all times" is Mr. White's comment. The 1907 Winton Type X-I-V is a refined edition of the Model K and retains all the cardinal features of the K with the addition of offset cylinders and cam shaft.

Knox Truck, Wholesalers' Body.

One of the most serviceable, durable and practicable of the auto trucks now in the market.

A license to use the Winton multiple disc clutch has been granted by the Winton Company to two American manufacturers of machinery, this being the first automobile invention to be adapted for machinery use. Features of this clutch which particularly commend it are minimized inertia, equalized spring pressure and smooth starting.

The Holley Bros. Co. of Detroit, the oldest carburetor house in America, has closed a contract with Alexander Winton whereby it secures the exclusive right to manufacture for the general trade the new carburetor which made its appearance last fall on the Winton Model M and Type X-I-V. This carburetor has no auxiliary air inlet and has demonstrated itself to be a wonderful power producer.

The famous "Golden Dragon" will be sent to San Francisco for the coming show. A number of the Eastern population of the country have seen this remarkable car and now the Dragon Automobile Company intends to give the West a treat.

The Dragon is made in two models, a 24-26 H. P. runabout and touring car, each having the same chassis.

Much newspaper space has been taken up of late in describing the various different makes of automobiles now before the public. The different advertisements all tend to convince the prospective purchaser that the car under discussion is the best on earth. Technical terms and adjectives galore almost bewilder the reader. Therefore the advertisement of the Lozier automobile, in another column, is worth calling attention to. Their announcement is extremely brief but worthy of considerable consideration. They state that their car is "legitimately high priced," but no repair bills.

Owing to the tremendous strain to which automobiles are subjected in generating their own power and applying it over all manners of road or no road, up hill and down, fast and slow, coming to sudden stops, and the lack of experience on the part of the operator, all these contribute toward and invite breakage. Probably no piece of machinery is subjected to such severe strains and the wonder is, not that so many cars need repairs, but the wonder is that they can be kept in repair at all. The Lozier cars have gained a reputation in the East of running a complete season without the expenditure of a dollar for repairs, and every visitor to the Automobile Show will be amply repaid in carefully looking over the Lozier exhibit.

A. A. Marshall of Fitchburg, Mass., recently drove a Winton Type X-I-V home from Boston through ten inches of snow, with practically no broken track in three and one-quarter hours. The car carried three full-grown passengers and made the trip without a stop or adjustment.

The '07 Rambler

The 1907 Rambler line of Automobiles is very complete. It is composed of four models. Model 27 a Runabout, and Model 21 a Touring Car, are both 2 cylinder cars. The engine which is of the horizontal double opposed type, shows marked improvement on everything attempted by 2 cylinder engine manufacturers. The construction is such that all the working parts of the engine and transmission are accessible from above. The transmission gear is the planetary type, absolutely noiseless, located on an extension of a motor shaft, and is entirely inclosed. The gear case is attached directly to the crank case of the motor and contains not only the change speed gear but the fly wheel and clutch, it is absolutely oil tight and the entire transmission mechanism runs in an oil bath. The motor and change speed gears are thus an integral unit with three points. The support and construction are of such strength and rigidity that no torsion of the motor frame however severe can cause disalignment of the gears or bearings. The connection between motor and transmission gears shows equal advance in design and strength. It is a multiple disclutch with friction service, greatly in excess of ordinary demands. All gears are cut from solid forgings, and carefully hardened. Hitherto in autos of this type combining so many excellent features the only criticism ever offered was the lack of accessibility to motors located under the body. This objection is entirely overcome in Rambler cars.

Not only are all the parts of the motor accessible, but the body of the car is so hinged that by loosening two knurled under nuts on either side of the car, the entire body may be swung over to the opposite side, and held in place by presses provided for the purpose, thus making all parts of the motor and transmission accessible.

The Rambler 4 cylinder car is produced in two models. The Model 24, a 30 horse power, beveled gear drive, with floating type rear axle. The Model 25, a 40 horse power double side chain drive. In these Models a new sliding gear transmission is introduced which is termed the progressive type, differing from all other sliding gear transmissions, on account of its simplicity. All the gears are controlled by one lever, and with the straight line movement of the lever one can pass from the reverse to the high speed gear, without clashing of the gears and without hesitancy. A new caburetter is also provided which is extremely simple, is easily adjusted and very economical. The workmanship and material used in Rambler cars is second to none and the exhibit made by this company at the coming Automobile Show will be well worth careful and critical inspection. The prices of the Models are as follows:

The Automobile Industry

The automobile show is looked forward to by many as an amusement, but that is only one of its casual aspects. The automobile show will convey an eloquent hint of the growing importance of the automobile industry. It has become one of the great industries of the country. A change has taken place in the character of the automobile as an article of commerce. It is no longer simply an expensive luxury appealing to the taste for sport. Its cost has been cheapened and its increased efficiency as a vehicle in all kinds of weather and on all sorts of roads has made it an indispensable utility to people of moderate means. Next to the trolley car the automobile is the most important factor in the great suburban real estate movement now under way. About every railway station it has greatly extended the territory available for residence. Formerly the commuter was practically limited to the suburban town or village in his choice of a dwelling. He can now live in the country proper. A machine representing an investment of a few hundred dollars takes him from the farm to the station in winter as well as in summer.

Generally speaking, the pleasure vehicle has been developed to the neglect of the commercial motor wagon. The demand for the pleasure cars was so great, the problems presented by them so well in hand, and the profit offered so much more, that the majority of the most capable designers and engineers have confined their attention to them, so that one of the greatest developments of the future is undoubtedly to be the working out, to an economical practicability, of motor wagons and trucks. Then will the original automobile yearning, calling for the abolition of animals for draught purposes, be fulfilled. Even those who were most skeptical a few years ago have now little doubt but what the motor vehicle is to work many transformations in the next two decades. It probably will be seen in forms not even fancied at present. The other things probable of its future are these: It will do the herculean work of keeping city streets clean. It will rush fresh produce and eggs and milk from the farm to market, and in many ways raise the average of health and the standard of comfort. It will be converted into formidable machines of destruction for armies and will make war more remote by making it more dreadful. It will fill an important place in agriculture and develop highways until it becomes a keen rival of the railroads in handling freight, and yet remain an ally to them. It will not only bring the town and country closer together, but will develop suburbs for residence sections, and it is quite likely that it will to some extent follow the history of the bicycle, and after being the rich man's top become the necessity of the workingman. It is not possible for it ever to be as cheaply built as the bicycle, but unquestionably small, cheap forms of it will be developed that will put it within the reach of a salesman's salary, and the cost of operation also will decrease. Where it will end is,

St. Louis Automobile will be exhibited in Space 36, Automobile Show, February 18th to 25th.

after all, much harder to conjecture than it is to get a fair knowledge of where it began.

No industry ever experienced such rapid development as that devoted to the manufacture and sale of automobiles. And great as that industry now is, its future will be far greater. The manufacture and use of pleasure carts, which have demonstrated the practicability of the self-propelled road vehicle, is simply a primary step toward the manufacture of cars destined to do the world's trucking. Thus far American manufacturers have been so extremely busy manufacturing pleasure cars that the wider and richer field of commercial wagons remains to-day practically uninvaded. This condition is certain to be changed. The change may not come rapidly, and preferably it should not come with a rush, for the commercial vehicle proposition, presenting somewhat different aspects from the pleasure car proposition, is one to be handled with deliberation.

The most healthful sign of the times for the automobile manufacturer, and for that matter to the distributor or agent, is the fact that the craziness of the whole game is rapidly passing away. The experienced buyer to-day does not attach the old importance to the magical word model, as applied to the machine made and delivered in one year as against the previous year's output from the same factory. A car that is good to start with in any given year needs only to be kept up to date in the little detail matters that make for the safety, comfort and peace of mind of the owner and driver, and the limit is also being rapidly reached in the absurd and useless additions to simple mechanical parts, which ought to be enough to keep the average layman busy learning his machine and understanding that as long as he has to do with a power plant on the flowing road it is well not to let his mind run away with the dazzlements of extra fixings, double-jointed action, and forty-odd complications, to effect a very simple move which the driver-owner these days is qualified to master without much mental strain.

Great improvement has been made in the general mechanism of the car during the past year as to strength, reliability and convenience of operation and repair, but it is still far from the standard of excellence which must be arrived at before the motor car can become an altogether popular vehicle. When the ordinary automobile can be used with little fear that anything will go wrong except the rubber tires, it will have a great many more advocates than it has at the present time, as well as users.

If the work which is now being carried on toward the perfection of suitable highways for automobile use and other uses carries through, great credit must be given the automobile industry for bringing about a condition which is so much needed, especially in the central, western and southern portions of this country, where good roads in some sections are practically unknown for six months in the year. If the automobile can bring about the molding of public sentiment in this direction, all the time and means that have been expended upon this interesting and acceptable method of transportation will be well placed and prove of great advantage to the country at large.

"The Bigness of Little Things," a Winton booklet dealing with the importance of small matters in automobile manufacturing, has been in such demand that a new edition has been issued.

His Question

It was Tuesday night. If it had been any other night Madge would have had to resort to some form of rebuke quite different from the one which is the motif of this story. She had been sitting on the sofa with Reginald ever since nine o'clock, and it was now approaching twelve. During all that time Reginald held himself in check. Not once did he permit the sentimental element in his nature to assert itself. Yet Madge looked good to him. Indeed her personality on this particular occasion was most alluring. She was in evening dress, and Reginald, being of the artistic temperament, was sensitive to the influence of evening dress. But even had Madge not been in evening dress Reginald would not have been oblivious to her physical charms, for they were manifold and extended to the roots of her fluffy blonde locks. But this story is not to be told in chapters and there is therefore no need of further digression.

"Dear," said Reginald, with something of the tenderness of a Romeo, "I am going to ask you a delicate question. I hope it will not cause a shock."

Madge's face lighted up at the prospect. For she thought that Reginald was about to end the monotony.

"You will notice," he said, exhibiting his watch, "that it is nearly midnight. Your father is out of town and your mother is in bed. We appear to be quite alone. We are sitting in the moonlight. A strange sensation steals over me. Methinks it is the ecstasy of love. Giddy expectation whirls me around. My blood speaks to you in my veins, so sweet is the imaginary relish. So I am constrained to ask, Do you think, considering the circumstances, it would be quite proper for me to kiss you?"

At that moment the cuckoo clock served notice that the hour of midnight had arrived.

And just as the mechanical bird withdrew the beautiful creature at Reginald's side laid a delicate hand on his arm.

"How unfortunate!" she exclaimed.

"What's unfortunate?" he asked.

"That you did not think of asking that question until Ash Wednesday morning," she said. Reginald, I must retire to my cell, for the penitential season is on."

And Reginald went his way.

The 1907 "White" Steam Car

Among the new models for 1907, the White steam car justly deserves a prominent place. Elegance and beauty of design are instantly apparent. The car is large, commodious, well appointed and of striking appearance. The builders have been exceedingly careful to make all parts of the car of the strength commensurate with the increased size and carrying capacity, and the generator and engine have been very materially increased so as to give almost double the horse power of last year's car. The new engine is an exceedingly substantial and promising piece of machinery and looks as if it would stand an endless amount of work and even abuse. The cranks, bearings, connecting rods, eccentric, links, and in fact all parts have been materially strengthened and enlarged. With this powerful engine and to 2½-to-1 gear with which it is equipped, the car is capable of very high speed.

The White car has always been a very simple car to operate and control, and this year that simplicity is very considerably increased by the addition of a new automatic known as a flow regulator, which regulates the supply of water and the supply of fuel in a most ingenious and effective manner. The White Company expect to have a circular ready for distribution at the Automobile Show, which will describe this completely. This flow regulator is so effective that it maintains a practically uniform steam pressure under all conditions. The fire is not only shut off automatically by the steam temperature, as formerly, but it is also shut off by the steam pressure through the action of the flow regulator when the steam pressure reaches a given point. This obviates all excessive steam pressures and eliminates turning off the fire by hand when descending long grades; in fact, hand control of the fire is no longer necessary under any circumstances, as the supply of gasoline not only shuts off when the steam pressure reaches the cut-off point, but also shuts off whenever the engine is stopped. The care with which the new system of regulation of the WHITE car has been thought out and elaborated is ingenious in the extreme. Better still, every automatic is positive in its action and is not subject to getting out of order easily.

Owing to these changes, which are of very general interest, it is safe to say that the exhibit of The White Company at the Automobile Show will be well patronized by all interested automobilists.

Aside from the standard pullman body, with which the 30-horse power chasses will be equipped, there will also be a landaulet car, with the customary folding back common to that design of car. This will be one of the very few cars of that style which has ever been seen on the Coast. It is a most popular make in the East; in fact, it is becoming as popular there as the Limousine. There will also be a 30 h. p. Limousine, and a 30 h. p. runabout with tiger seat, the body design of the latter being in accordance with the latest Eastern ideas.

The space to be occupied by the exhibit of WHITE cars at the Show will be 28 feet by 42 feet, fronting on three aisles, so there will be ample room for a large exhibit.

The Severn, at 1050 Geary street, is a delightfully appointed restaurant.

The Winton Company announces that it will shortly open its own branch house in Detroit. From this announcement it is evident that the Winton Company finds the branch house plan profitable, for such establishments have been conducted for several years in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago and London, in addition to which a Winton branch was opened in Pittsburg about a year ago.

E. H. Gato, the wealthy cigar manufacturer of Havana, Tampa, and Key West, has just placed his order for a Winton X-I-V.

The Winton runabout, which enjoyed much popularity at the New York show, varies from conventional design. It does not cater to the semi-racer idea, but rather makes a strong appeal by reason of its graceful lines and comfortable seating arrangements.

Chas. B. Shanks, general sales manager of the Winton Company, will shortly go to Florida to recuperate from the la grippe atmosphere of the show season.

around—soup, fish, an entree, filet, chicken, salad, fruit and dessert—all small portions, and the meats often sweaty or cold. The dejeuner is about the same, minus the soup, one meat and dessert. The breakfast is coffee and rolls. For this poorly cooked and skimpy medley you are robbed, first at the office, of from $7 to $25 per day, and then, all along the line, from concierge to elevator boys.

The Ritz is a made-over stuffy "old-new" device for nouveau-riche Americans who want to get their names in the newspapers, rich provincials and an occasional Englishman who ought to know better.

The Continental is also a fine old robber, but it gives you more for your money, and is generally a fairer place than the Elysee Palace, Ritz, l'Athenee, Vendome, Bristol, Terminus, or the old Grand.

In 1866 I stopped at the Grand a month for about $4 per day, full board. In 1887 my full board for three persons cost me under $15 per day. Two years afterward (Exposition of 1889) the same apartments and board cost me not much more. But in 1900 I occupied my old apartments of two years before for a few days, and was charged—for full board for three—$60 per day! All these hotels are old, and dangerous in case of fire (except the Elysee) and none have bathrooms attached to suites except the Elysee and Regina.

There are 44 (so-called) first-class hotels in Paris, 960 second class, and many others, but only two have bathrooms attached to rooms and more than half of the others have no modern facilities for bathing. But the grasping landlords all charge you as much as they dare, provide you with as little as they can, and you are obliged to fee, at least once a week—or be placed on the servants' blacklist—concierge, cashier, porter, waiter and head waiter, maid and hall-man, elevator boys and generally others. And, worse than all this, the cooking is poor and getting poorer, for the good old cooks of Paris are all dead or have gone to America and England. I do not blame them, for the landlords have become so mercenary that the poor chefs have of late years had no opportunity of exhibiting their culinary skill. Again, Paris has made very little headway in warming its hotels and other houses. Why, in this magnificent city of millions of inhabitants, there are but six hotels heated by steam or hot air, like all the leading hotels in the United States. It is generally the same old method of a hundred years ago—a few fag-gots and a little coal.

Rowland Strong, in his delightful book entitled "Where and How to Dine in Paris," has these things to say of the Paris hotels: "Paris is a city of hotels, most of them bad." * * * "What a pity it was that, instead of burning down the Hotel Ville, they did not burn down most of the other hotels—I mean those that travelers stop at." * * * "As it is, there is hardly a third-rate town in Germany or Italy, to say nothing of Switzerland, which is not better provided with hotel accommodation than Paris." * * * "A friend of mine who stopped at one of the largest hotels could get no room with bath." * * * "During the past two or three years there has been a terrible slump in the hotel business. There may be various explanations of this, but, undoubtedly, and, probably, the principal, is the bad name the Paris hotel has gradually acquired." * * * "They are expensive, their proprietors are thievish and curmudgeonly; and in the event of an outbreak of fire they are positive death-traps." * * * "What a catastrophe will occur here one of these days!"

The Dragon Painter

With the amount of attention which is being lavished on the Japanese question, Mary McNeil Fenollosa (Sidney McCall) can congratulate herself on having had her "Dragon Painter" make its appearance at this time. The plot is quite aside from the usual novel and just as far from the hackneyed "trial marriage" and purple-eyed baby cult. Kano Indara was the last of his race and likewise the last of a race of great painters. His only child was a daughter, not without talent of her own, but, as all the world over, she was not esteemed as a son would have been. However beloved, she would not perpetuate the name. Kano Indar's greatest wish was to discover some young artist with talent so great as to make him worthy of adoption, when, by marriage with Ume-ko both the name and the blood would be continued. He had about despaired of success when there was introduced to his notice Tatsu, almost a wild man, one whose ancestry was unknown or forgotten and whose ability was self-acquired. He lived for art alone, drawing on the rocks, in the sand, on sheets of paper which were occasionally given to him, but preserving nothing. When the picture was completed it was given to the winds, and it was some of this ungarnered store which was gathered up by another, once an artist but now in an engineer corps, and brought to Kano for inspection. Nothing would satisfy the old man but that this artist should be brought to him at Yeddo, but when this was accomplished it was found as difficult to domesticate him as it would have been to tame an eagle. Tatsu called himself the "Dragon Painter." He embodied the dragon in all his work, and had a belief, a superstition, or a dream, as one may please, that somewhere in the world was a maiden who was his, had been designed for him alone since the beginning of time and that they sought each other forever. One of the drawings which fell into Kano's hands represented this "Dragon Maid," and singularly, it bore some resemblance to his own daughter, Ume-ko. In order to chain the wild man, Kano, after plying him with unaccustomed stimulants, sent for the daughter to appear, giving the command to the old servant to summon the "Dragon Maid." Ume-ko made a dramatic entrance, and the tableau was so satisfactorily worked out that one cannot help suspecting collusion or rehearsal. At all events the ruse was a success. Tatsu demanded his treasure and was put off with explanations of the demands of social requirements and etiquette, though Kano would have been only too glad to have dispensed with delay. Tatsu was not more eager to possess the "Dragon Maid" than her father was to secure the adoption of this waif, and the girl was not considered at all. Indeed it would not have been the proper thing for her to have opposed her father's will, even though he had not been so devoted to ART as to have considered any sacrifice unimportant. Ume-ko had a bit of romance in her own nature, and instead of being repelled by this tatterdemalion, she fell in love with him, another breach of propriety, which, of course, she was careful to conceal. In due time the marriage took place. Kano Indara was frantic with impatience. He wanted Tatsu to paint, to paint, and always to paint, while the youth, being in love, scarcely touched his brushes and was oblivious to the snares set for him. Seven days were reluctantly granted for the honeymoon, after which the young couple came home to the parental nest, but speedily discord entered. Kano Indara again begged, entreated, commanded the youth to produce pictures. He refused, sulked, declared that he painted only because he was distracted for the "Dragon Maid," and now, having her, he would paint no more. Indara appears to have had a genuine artistic temperament, for he made no provision for the future, and little by little the treasures of his home were sold to pay living expenses,

THE INCOMPARABLE WHITE

FOR 1907

Model G, Pullman Body.

An express shipment of these cars has arrived. Call and see them. They are speedy, reliable, handsome cars, having strength and stamina for all requirements.

Aside from the fact that The White Company is now building two separate and distinct models of cars, one of 20 steam horse power and the other of 30 steam horse power, the latter car being far the largest, speediest and most powerful it has ever built, the chief feature of interest is the new system of fuel and water regulation. By an entirely novel application of automatic devices, which are simple in the extreme and positive in action, the steam pressure is not subject to any appreciable fluctuation, but stands steadily at one point, whether the car is running rapidly or slowly, up hill or down hill. By this system, the economy of the car is also regulated, so that the most inexperienced person can get the same satisfactory results as the most expert WHITE operator. This new feature will make the WHITE car more than ever a car for which a chauffeur is not necessary and a car which any lady can drive.

We will exhibit at the San Francisco Show a full line of our cars, including the elegant limousine and landaulet styles.

but still Tatsu remained idle. He shocked his father by openly making love to Ume-ko, and even she had no influence over him when it came to that point. The tempting array of brushes and pigments did not arouse him, and when she turned to her own work, hoping that the example would prove salutary he but turned her efforts into play. Matters went from bad to worse, until yet another deception was practiced. Once, on one of their rambles together, Ume-ko narrowly escaped drowning through the caving of a bank on which she was resting. The river current was strong at that point, and anything which fell into the water would be speedily carried out to sea. Seeing how affairs were drifting it was arranged between herself and her father that she should pretend suicide, leaving evidences of drowning on the bank, and a farewell letter to her husband regretting that her presence had interfered with his career, yet enjoining him from following her example lest it separate them in the land of spirits, and leave them another age-long quest of each other in the future. Ume-ko retired to a monastery, and Tatsu, after a long illness, returned to the house of Kano Indara. In time everything worked out well, as it might have done anyway but for the impatience of the old painter. The story differs from most of those involving an unequal marriage, since the young people were perfectly satisfied with each other, and the dissatisfaction was entirely with Kano Indara, but perhaps, had they been living by themselves, and Ume-ko trying to carry on a household without an income, her sweetness and patience might have been somewhat ruffled. Perhaps, too, had Tatsu come into the dining hall hungry and found no meal prepared, he might have taken a different view of his obligations, but all's well that ends well, and the insight into religious customs and family conduct is worth while. Illustrations are by Gertrude McDaniel, but they do not seem to have been drawn from Japanese models. Published by Little, Brown & Co.

"Two Little Friends in Norway"

Judging by title and illustrations, the unwary might be led to conclude that "Two Little Friends in Norway" is designed for little readers. Though the two tiny maids play their part, they are really thrust into the background by the older members of the party who are making a tour of the north, and there is much of courtship, sharp interchange of what passes for wit and cleverness amongst the half-grown of both sexes, and display of snobbery on the part of the women amongst the tourists which the little girls will resent as interloping. The two little children are almost direct contrasts, one the child of a foolish but wealthy mother who lavishes gifts and dry goods, as well as ill-temper, on her child, until she has nearly ruined the little one's naturally good disposition; the other a Norwegian peasant, obedient, silent and reverential, with a sturdy regard for truth and honor and a determined will, in spite of her seven brief years. Margaret Sidney, the author, is well known through her "Little Peppers," the series having expanded to ten volumes. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

Meredith Nicholson's title, "The House of a Thousand Candles," seems to have caught the public fancy. A railroad company has named one of its routes "The road of a thousand wonders," a summer resort placarded itself as "the house of a thousand delights," and there are at least two candy manufacturers who advertise themselves as "the house of a thousand candies." California was a good bit ahead of the bandwagon, however, for we had our "Legislature of a thousand drinks," and that other one of "a thousand scandals" long before Mr. Nicholson took up the trade of writing. His new novel, now current in "The Reader," and to be published in the spring by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, has an attractive title, "The Port of Missing Men." —The Bookworm.

The Annals of Pickeye.

The Long Tom saloon was ablaze that Christmas eve. Great masses of cedar-boughs and wreaths of wild holly lent it an uncommonly festive appearance, which was accentuated by the lively strains of the string band. A greater concourse than usual thronged the place; the gambling and card tables were crowded, and a buzz of conversation pervaded the entire room.

"How's the claim panning out, Dobie?" inquired one of a group that had ranged itself before the bar.

"Pretty fair; about an ounce a day to the hand," was the reply. "How are you doing?"

"Just ornary at present; I ain't into the true channel yet. But J-B here, who's working next to me, found a ten-ounce nugget yesterday."

"Yes," assented J-B, "and I'll find a chunk bigger than a horse's head in that formation yet."

"I hope so," said Dobie Joe. "I always believed"—

The speech was interrupted, or drowned rather, by someone just outside the door singing in tones as loud and clear as a trumpet:

"Uncle Josiah and his son Sam

They built 'em a ship in the shape of a clam

To sail down to Nantucket P'int."

"Hello, that's Cape Ann!" exclaimed J-B, and he added, as the sturdy vocalist entered, "Here, Cape Ann, won't you join us?"

"It's just what I'm hunting for, boys," was the response, as the speaker fell in alongside.

"What shall it be, gentlemen?" asked the barkeeper.

"A little tarantula-juice for me," replied J-B.

"The same here," remarked his neighbor.

"Some of your forty-yard brandy this way, Cap," said Cape Ann.

"That'll do as well as anything else," observed Dobie Joe. The other choices were expressed in as indefinite a way, but everyone was served without hesitation. As the glasses were being drained the express messenger entered and flung the letter-bag onto the bar.

"Hello, here's Todd's letter-express!" exclaimed J-B.

The exclamation attracted attention throughout the room, and all except the dealers and more interested players crowded around the bar. Cap Ryan opened the pouch, took out a bundle of letters and began calling off the addresses.

"Hornblower, Dillon, Yost, Prendegast, Allen McClatchey, Arkwright, Jellison—Jabez Jellison, that's you, isn't it, J-B?"

"Them's my initials," acknowledged the identified, depositing a dollar on the counter and receiving the letter.

"Penrod, Brown, McKinnon, Allsop, Smith, Henderson, Kirby—William Kirby, that's for you, Cape Ann."

"It couldn't be sweeter by any other name," answered the recipient, depositing the express charge.

"Jenkins, Wells, McCurdy, Selfridge, O'Connor, Ellsworth, Fitch, Allison—Mrs. George Allison, that's the little widow up at Lang's Bar, isn't it?"

A chorus of voices responded in the affirmative.

"I'll ante for that," said Dobie Joe.

"Of course, he will," observed someone significantly, and there was a general laugh, above which rose Cape Ann's clarion voice singing:

"All on the 'Cosme river,

Where the miners dig the dust,

She stole my heart, that fair young widow,

And I'll marry her, or bust."

"You seem to think it nothing but a good joke on me, boys," quietly remarked Dobie Joe, when the laugh and song had died away. "That's all right, as far as I'm concerned. But there isn't one of you, if he knew what a hard row that little woman is hoeing up there and how bravely she is doing it, but would do as much and a great deal more than I've done for her."

A sudden silence came over the boisterous crowd, during which Cap Ryan called out the remaining addresses unheeded.

"Let's give her a benefit," suggested J-B.

"A Christmas gift—this is Christmas eve," seconded Arkansas.

"That's it, a regular old Santa Claus lay-out for the widow and her kids," proclaimed Cape Ann, in a voice whose ring thrilled every one in the room. "There's my toss-in toward it," he added, pitching a buckskin purse onto the bar.

"And mine."

"And mine."

"And mine."

"And mine."

And the repetend continued to go on, as others pressed forward in eager rivalry to lay down their offerings. It was just a touch of nature and the natural response of men keyed up to an emotional pitch. There was not a bit of forethought or benevolence in it.

"Jumping Jingo! what are you going to do with all of this dust?" exclaimed Cap Ryan, as he heaped the contributions in a pile.

"Paint the heavens as they have never been painted since the Nativity," solemnly replied Cape Ann, voicing the spirit of exaltation that animated the crowd.

"Boys, don't you feel that we've gone about as far as we should go in our rough way?" suggested Dobie Joe. "It seems to me there should be someone who could give a kind of graceful and sacred turn to the thing. Hadn't we better call in Elder Beals?"

"Good idea, Dobie; the Elder is just the man. You go and get him," cried Cape Ann; and the sentiment meeting with general approval, Dobie Joe went in search of Elder Beals, that his presence might soften and sanctify the proceedings.

There was a suspension of everything but talk for the next half hour or more, when Dobie returned with the preacher.

"Good evening, gentlemen," said Elder Beals, nodding affably in different directions. "I am informed that you have set on foot a mission of goodwill and charity and wish me to join with you. I'm only too glad to do so, and will humbly try to perform my part."

However the early California miners may be regarded with respect to their morals and manners, they had one indisputable merit—they were executive. Whether the proposition were a gigantic labor or a piece of tomfoolery, a lynching or a carouse, they set about it with a zeal and unanimity that were effectual.

Thus it was that Christmas-eve. Whimsical as had been the origin of the idea, it had caught the general fancy, and by the time it was fully developed every person was impressed with his individual responsibility in seeing it properly carried out.

In less time than nowadays it would take the indispensable committee to organize for such a purpose, stores were being ransacked, pack-animals secured, and the execution of the project was fully under way.

The stock of provisions and comforts, the variety of dainties and luxuries, the wealth of dolls, toys and holiday gaudery furnished forth by the stores of Pickeye that night would astonish anyone who thinks there were only the barest necessities of life to be had in the mines at that time. But it is not worth while to particularize, except that far the most valuable part of the gift was left in the shape of gold dust. Eight heavily packed mules bore away the substantial Christmas present, a hundred resolute men following, with Elder Beals and his tin horn in the lead.

While all this festivity and preparation were going on at Pickeye, a very different scene was passing in the widow's cabin up at Lang's Bar.

The little ones had rushed joyously to their mother to inform her of Dobie Joe's instructions about hanging up their stockings. To their surprise, she did not appear to share their enthusiasm in regard to it. She straightened up, however—leaning her shoulders far backward, to give herself a little rest—and said, wearily:

"Well, you may hang them up as he told you to. Maybe he knows better than I do."

"He wouldn't have said it if he didn't know," asserted Fanny positively.

"No, Dobie Joe wouldn't fool us," was Johnny's as confident endorsement.

"I don't think he would, either. He is too honest and kind to deceive any one. Perhaps the ground-squirrel told him something about Santa Claus that I don't know. But I wouldn't look for very much, if I were you. When you expect but little you can never be greatly disappointed."

"I'd like a doll, though," said Fanny wistfully.

"And I'd like a drum—and—some candy," exclaimed Johnny, vainly trying to limit his desire to a single object.

"Well, that isn't a great deal to wish for, and if Santa Claus has any left he may bring them. But if I had a wish," said the widow, hastily bending over the washtub again, "I should wish he would bring us something to eat, for you will have to go to bed hungry tonight."

When night came, and the scant fare had been very unequally distributed, so far as the mother's share was concerned, and the children querulously asked her for more, she told them they must be patient and wait until the morrow, when she hoped to be able to give them enough.

"But it's always wait, and always tomorrow, mother," complained Fanny fretfully.

"I know it, child," was the meek reply; "but things may change for the better. I shall hear from home very soon now."

"But we may starve before then," retorted Fanny.

"No, the Lord will not let us," replied the widow bravely. "He may try their faith, but He will not finally forsake those who trust in Him. He let His chosen people suffer a long time before He sent the quails and manna to them, and poor Elijah was probably hungrier than we when the ravens came to feed him."

"They might come and feed us too, if they knew how poor we was!" was Johnny's sudden inspiration. "Let's open the door."

"It won't be any use," said incredulous Fanny.

Johnny flung the door wide open, however, and called to the imaginary ravens to come. But there was no response, except the mournful sigh of the wind through the pines.

"There ain't any here," he announced; "but there's quails up in the woods, I know, and maybe there's manner. I'm going to look for it tomorrow."

"How silly, Johnny!" exclaimed skeptical Fanny.

"No, Fanny," gently rebuked the mother, "faith is never silly. Its visions may not always be realized, but the soul is always better for having cherished it. No ravens will come to feed us, no manna be found; but Johnny's simple faith that God might send them is prettier than your doubt."

"How can I help it, mama, when nothing ever comes?" pleaded Fanny.

"Dobie Joe comes," corrected Johnny.

"But he ain't something to eat."

"Maybe he'll bring it, though."

"Yes, like your ravens," sneered desperate Fanny.

"Come, come, children; it's bad enough without your quarreling," interposed the mother. "Let us trust that help will come, without questioning how or when. There is a sweet hymn that says:

"It may not be my way, it may not be thy way,

Yet in His own way, God will provide."

"And, again:

"It may not be my time, it may not be thy time,

Yet in His own time, God will provide."

In quoting, the widow had recalled unconsciously the touching air of the hymn, and she sang the lines in a low, sweet voice. The children always loved to hear their mother sing. But of late she sang so seldom that the soft strains now had the additional charm of a tender memory. Doubt, disappointment, even hunger, no longer troubled them; their mother's soothing words and tones had brought their hearts into accord with the spirit of the hymn.

"Now, my darlings, say your prayers and go to bed; it is very late," said the mother, when their quietness showed the gentler feeling that possessed them.

"But our stockings, mama; we must hang them up outside the door," said Fanny.

"Yes, so we must," echoed Johnny.

"Well, then, we'll do that first."

So two little stockings were suspended from nails outside; the prayers were said, Johnny appending to the usual formula, "Now, God and Dobie Joe, don't forget our stockings"; and then sweet sleep came and cast its blessed spell upon them.

Under the starry midnight sky, through woods and openings, up hill and down, the procession that was bearing the Christmas gift to the widow and her children held its way along the winding trail up the creek.

There was little talk. Walking in Indian file is not conducive to conversation; and, besides, discussion had expended itself and all were now intent with the execution of their purpose. Points of interest, at times, elicited a few remarks—as where drunken Benson found a pound nugget the day after he recovered from a spree and showed his last dollar to the new moon; or where Paddy McCann killed the sluice-robber and built a cabin over his grave to lay the ghost; but for most part the men so noisy an hour before were now as silent as the night itself.

When the head of the canyon just below Lang's Bar was reached, Dobie Joe called a halt. There was necessity for caution now. The mules were unpacked and tethered, and the work of stealthily conveying the stores to the widow's cabin begun.

"I think we've earned a drink all around, boys," said Cape Ann, producing a bottle. "Hasn't the tramp heated you under the collar enough to try a swig, Elder Beals?"

"No, thank you," cheerily replied the preacher; "though, under the circumstances, I'm disposed to look upon it as more of a sacrament than a tippie."

When the goods had been noiselessly deposited, with a big placard saying "From Santa Claus" stuck on them, and Dobie Joe had crept like a mouse onto the porch and stuffed the little stockings hanging by the door, he and Cape Ann began decorating the young pines in front of the cabin after the fashion of Christmas-trees. They climbed up and about like squirrels, and as each article was tossed up it was caught and secured to some branch, while gay ribbons were strung in every direction, and over all was flung a profusion of glittering tinsel.

The labor finished, the whole party moved a little way off to see, as well as they could in the dimness, what the effect would be by daylight.

"The work wasn't so all-fired hard," observed Cape Ann, drawing a sleeve across his face, "but somehow it makes my eyes sweat."

There was hardly an eye in the whole crowd but was similarly affected. Elder Beals, brushing away the moisture that dimmed his own sight, said:

"They are not bitter ones, but it is still true of them that they who sow in tears shall reap in joy."

The party was waiting at the head of the canyon when daylight came. Through the bushes could be seen the cabin and the pile of goods and gayly bedecked pines in front of it. No one there was yet astir. The eastern sky grew brighter, and still there was no sign of life. Just as the sun rose above the rim of the mountains and set the ribbons and tinsel aflame, Elder Beals placed the tin horn to his lips and sent forth a reveille that woke the echoes in the remotest canyons.

There was a sudden unfastening of the cabin door. Two little nightgowned figures ran out upon the porch, and caught sight of the clump of pines in all its gorgeous brilliance. For a moment they stood bewildered and dumb. Then Fanny threw up her hands ecstatically and shouted:

"O mama, mama, look here! Santa Claus has come above Pickeye!"

The widow came to the door, gave a quick, almost frightened, look; then, folding the children in her arms, she knelt upon the sill.

While she was still kneeling, eight mules began wending their way back toward Pickeye, followed by a hundred men, silent and weary but supremely happy.

The affair had been so impromptuous, to quote Cape Ann's descriptive term, that C. Augustus Dinkey, the young Foothill Bard, though deeply inspired by it and beginning at once to thrash out a poem for the occasion, was not able to deliver it along with the other goods. It took him three days to lick it into shape, during which time many sidelights and embellishments accrued. There is little of the force or felicity of his best style in it; but, as his poems are inseparably linked with the annals of Pickeye, it is given here, as a sort of codicil:

A CHILD'S FAITH

The night was dark; a tempest swayed

The hut from roof to floor;

Two little children cowered, afraid

A wolf was at the door.

There was! Their mother, kneeling, prayed

And then she took the Holy Book
And from its pages read
How ravens came to Cherith brook
And poor Elijah fed,
When, with a bright inspired look,
The youngest listener said:

"Why, they might come and feed us too,
If only they knew where!"
Then open wide the door he threw
And called to them in prayer;
No raven to their succor flew.
Though raven Night was there.

But perfect faith is never lost,
God will not let it fail;
And while the child's faint prayer was tossed
In mockery by the gale
God's servants, like an angel host,
Were coming up the trail.

Yes, messengers of His, for still
He works in wondrous ways;
The winged ones who once did His will
Have vanished from our gaze,
And they who His behests fulfill
Just hoof it nowadays.

They brought a bounteous stock of food
And gifts in ample store,
For God in his kind fatherhood
Sends all we ask and more;
Then said the child, "I knew we should Find ravens at the door."

Or rich or poor, or high or low,
Be great the need or small,
It matters not, because we know
One watches over all
Without whose care—Christ tells us so—

Good Comes Out of Santa Ana

How refreshing it is to learn that our Legislature, now in session in Sacramento, is not wholly bad! Until last week we were in great agony of spirit owing to the apparent unanimity of discreditable sentiment in the halls of State legislation. It seemed to be generally acknowledged that all had been tarred with the same brush, that they were all birds of a feather, hopelessly unregenerate, unrepentant and unashamed. True it is that Senator Wolfe affirmed his claim to public confidence by pointing to himself as one whose heart daily turns Godward and addresses the throne of grace humbly supplicating mercy and deliverance from folly, vanity and vice; but this truly edifying episode, by the untoward, boisterous gayety it provoked among the Senator's cynical constituents and skeptical friends, lamentably failed to enhance the reputation of the Legislature for piety. So effective has been the team work of the newspaper correspondents in smothering the Legislature with opprobrium that even the daily chaplain, the beauty of whose holiness effloresces in his countenance, has been unable by dint of prayer to wash away the least of the stains. It was reserved for Senator Anderson of Santa Ana to persuade us that virtue has not been as effectually excluded as Mr. Livernash from the halls of legislation. Senator Anderson might have blushed unseen to the end of the session if one of his associates had not become involved in a shocking domestic scandal in Bakersfield. That was too much for Anderson of Santa Ana, and he at once disclosed himself in print making us realize how inaccurate was the judgment that mingled all the legislators in one rude heap of iniquity. It appears that Senator Anderson regards the Bakersfield scandal as a reproach to the whole Senate, but he does not stop at reprobation of that affair. He deplores the unchaste atmosphere of the whole Legislature which he attributes to the practice of employing some women of imperfect morals. This is a practice demoralizing in its influence and therefore our sympathies should go out to the decent married men who are thus menaced by vicious contact. It is bad enough for a legislator to be a grafter, impelled by greed and dishonesty, but quite as bad to be constantly confronted by the lamp that is lit in woman's eye. All honor to Senator Anderson for his timely protest. Senator Anderson is a man with the courage of his rectitude. The old familiar verse of Ecclesiastes, "Be not righteous overmuch; why shouldest thou destroy thyself?" has no terrors for him. He hates sin and is not afraid to pillory it even when it exhibits its abhorrent visage in high places. "It is a shame," said Anderson to the reporter, "that we are compelled to meet objectionable people." This was an allusion to the aforesaid women of imperfect morals that are said to invade the halls of legislation in the guise of attaches. A shame? Indeed it is, and outrageous too that unspotted married men should have to meet such persons. In fancy we see the leer of the cynic and hear him scoff at the suggestion that it is possible to corrupt further the legislators at Sacramento. But it should be remembered that wickedness is infinite in its variety, and that the sinner should not be encouraged to broaden the field of his vices. Senator Anderson might doubtless bring a more sweeping indictment against conditions in Sacramento if Senatorial courtesy did not hold him in check. But his interview was brief. He did not assume to discuss seriatim all the crimes against which the Decalogue thunders. It was the one sin of unchastity that inspired his utterances; and that is perhaps the sin which is most abhorrent to him. Every man has his pet aversions, and every man has imperfections that are the pet aversions of others, but this is a circumstance that none of us ponder; that if we were to ponder we should all be more charitable to one another. If we were all ever mindful of it and all free from hypocrisy then would we follow Burton's advice—flout sin and spare the individual. But all this has nothing to do with the case in hand. When Senator Anderson, who is perhaps not less chaste than the mountain ice congealed to crystal, heard of the Greenwell episode in Bakersfield he was quick to deal out his censure; to quick if, as Greenwell alleges, he is as innocent as Anderson himself, but the immaturity of the latter's judgment must not be considered in derogation of his intentions. Anderson has made it clear that the Legislature is not wholly bad; that it numbers among its members one that fears God and eschews evil. The dispatches from Sacramento tell us that when Lieutenant Governor Porter read the Anderson interview he quoted the words of Christ which forbid censure of sin by those who are not without sin. The Lieutenant Governor would disparage the aggressive righteousness of an Anderson who, by winning for his virtue the admiration of men would lure them into enmity to their own vices. Lieutenant Governor Porter is perhaps possessed of that peculiar charity which disposes men to sympathy with those in affliction, and who while they reprehend in their hearts misdeeds for which they can find no palliation, withhold expression of sentiments that can only add to the misery of the guilty. This attitude may be praiseworthy, but when we find one Anderson in an abandoned body of men, one white, unspotted sheep in a flock of soiled, bespattered ones, we are inclined to expedite the news of our joyful gratification. We think that the innumerable horde of pure, high-minded men who do not live in glass houses will agree that it was a particularly happy consummation that gave us an Anderson at a time when honest statesmen were as rare as felines on a block infested with bull terriers. Anderson looms large among his associates. Anderson is a shining mark. It would not surprise us to learn that when Anderson goes to church in little Santa Ana he rolls aloft the Psalms of David with a livelier, lustier relish than any of his neighbors, and that he is ever mindful in the midst of his lyrical ecstasy that the words are those of a royal murderer and adulterer beloved of God. We find a thrill in the thought that Anderson the unspotted may diffuse his influence for good with an uplifting, exalting effect.

To Discourage Jingoism

The growing need of popular understanding of international law is explained by Secretary Root in an introductory article in a new quarterly, "The American Journal of International Law," which has just made its appearance. Briefly stated, the need of popular understanding of this subject is due to the fact that wars are often provoked by a rash public sentiment which the statesmen of the countries involved are powerless to control. Secretary Root has nothing to say of the injudicious talk of the imminence or inevitability of war with Japan, but he might have cited it as an example with which to elucidate his meaning. It now appears that the rumors of the imminence of war with Japan were entirely without foundation. And it also appears that there was some uneasiness both in Washington and Tokio occasioned by those groundless rumors, the statesmen of both countries being apprehensive of an intemperate popular sentiment, which is always to be guarded against when there is much injudicious discussion of differences between nations. The rumors of war were due to a misconception of a statement made by Viscount Hayashi, the Mikado's Foreign Minister, made in the Japanese House of Representatives. He expressed the belief that the right of the Japanese to attend any public schools in this city would be eventually conceded, adding that "in the event of an unfavorable decision the anti-Japanese movement in California would be considered to represent the opinion of the whole United States, which would require diplomatic adjustment." In other words, according to his notion, if the question should be submitted to our Supreme Court and that tribunal should decide that the treaty-making power vested in our President and Senate did not confer the right to exercise or suspend powers which under the Tenth Amendment of our Constitution are "reserved to the States respectively or to the people," then it would be necessary to take up the treaty for amendment. From these innocent remarks it was inferred that the Japanese were seeking a cause of quarrel with the United States, whereas Viscount Hayashi was anticipating efforts to arouse public feeling. He wished it to be understood by the Japanese that even though the decision should be unfavorable differences could be diplomatically adjusted; that there was no likelihood of friction and nothing to be taken seriously. But the emollient influence of his words was in a measure counteracted by the truculent remarks of professional agitators in this country.

Importance of Diffusing Knowledge

Secretary Root points out in his introductory article in the new magazine that while Governments do not make war nowadays unless assured of general and hearty support on the part of the people that they represent they are sometimes driven into war against their will by the pressure of strong popular feeling. That was the case in 1870, when Napoleon III, cognizant of the inadequacy of his military resources, would if he could have avoided a contest with Germany. It was also the case in 1898 when we went to war with Spain in deference to an aroused public opinion, wrought to indignation by the blowing up of the Maine. Mr. Root thinks that the diffusion of a knowledge of international rights and duties, by promoting a general habit of reading and thinking about international affairs, will conduce to the preservation of the peace of the world. Unquestionably, as Mr. Root suggests the more clearly the people of a country understand their rights the less likely are they to take extreme and extravagant views of them; and, he might have added, the less likely are they to be influenced by demagogues and combinations of men with self-interests to subserve. Though the causes of war are not as numerous as they were in the days when Pericles vanquished the Samnians to please a woman, or in the days when Wolsey's ambition plunged England into war with France, or when Europe was kept in ferment by the intrigues of a de Maintenon, a Pompadour and a Duchess of Marlborough, still there are examples of the agency of personal considerations to be found in the strife of nations among the causes which have a general and almost constant operation on the collective body of society. England's war with the Boers was brought about by a gang of financial pirates. To one man, William R. Hearst, has been attributed, the high tension of public feeling at the time of the explosion of the Maine, the cause of which this country has been reluctant to investigate. The variety, intricacy and magnitude of our foreign affairs are such that to avoid the embarrassment and injury of strained relations and the calamities of actual war we should strive to be informed at all times and in all emergencies of our international obligations and duties. Our policy so far as consistent with national honor should be conciliatory, characterized by forbearance and free from the cheap braggadocio that appeals to the mob. We should strive to be guided by the principle that firmness in holding a position is best guaranteed by caution in determining the merits of the controversy. Notwithstanding The Hague tribunal men still build their faith upon the holy text of sword and gun preferring the infallible arbitrament of artillery to the sober dictates of the blind goddess. Christian nations affect deference to the principles of justice but they differ radically under the stimulus of self-interest and the pressure of popular feeling as to the application of those principles. So widely do they differ that we are justified in doubting the sincerity that professes to be guided by the principles of justice, and in agreeing with Lord Lytton who, when Ambassador to France, argued that the principles of morality have no control in the intercourse of nations; that Governments are neither capable of nor amenable to ethical rules and are guided by considerations of expediency.

The Mothering of Washington

Gilson Willetts has been writing for a magazine of "The Nations Debt to Mothers," and his article will doubtless be frequently quoted for it is in line with a popular and cherished delusion. The influence of mothers is not always beneficent, and it is mischievous to foster the notion that maternal zeal can never be misdirected. Men have quite often succeeded in spite of their mothers. George Washington was one of that class; yet Mr. Willetts credits George's widowed mother with having made him the father of his country. George Washington tells another story as we may learn by consulting his diaries. Take for example his reference to his father's efforts to teach him to leap his pony. The animal fell with his young rider, and the senior Washington counselled the boy to try it again, whereupon the mother ran out in hysterics, declaring that the boy would be murdered. "But my father was this manner of man; he hated defeat, while my mother was ever desirous of keeping me out of danger, because it made her uncomfortable, and this was strange, for I have never been able to see that she was greatly pleased when I was successful, or much moved by what the Great Master allowed me to attain in later years." In another place he says, after describing the provisions of his father's will: "this might have sufficed her with economy, but that virtue she found difficult to practice, and was never a prudent or a managing woman. She soon felt her children to be a heavy burden upon an estate which was none too large, and complained, as was common for her to do all her life, that she was poor, and this even when I was assured that she was comfortably cared for." Washington assures us, nevertheless, that with all her faults his love for her never abated. He recorded that she possessed many good qualities, but that after the death of his father, wise and strong government was gone and things were ever after at sixes and sevens. He complained that his mother borrowed money from those who were not her relations, that no one controlled his actions; and he impels us to the inference that her mismanagement proved advantageous to him by impressing his brothers with the importance of taking him in charge. Mothers, in truth, are not endowed with supernatural virtues, but it would be well for them to be grounded in those virtues that are universally recognized as advantageous. Blessed is the child that obtains from its mother a little of the useful knowledge that cannot be escaped in the inevitable school of experience in which we all must matriculate but from which none of us graduate. Mothers stamp the coin of character but the impression depends on the die.

The Effective Big Stick

Mayor Schmitz is probably convinced by this time that he committed a big tactical blunder when he insisted on accompanying the Board of Education to Washington. The event shows that the President's object in calling the school officials to the White House was not to gain new light on the controversy with a view to a compromise solution, but merely to exert upon them the influence of his compelling personality in order to wring from them that assent to his policy which they were able stubbornly to withhold while separated from him by the width of the continent. The President shrewdly guessed that the San Francisco Board of Education was not made up of the sort of men who would dare to fight him while their reverent feet pressed the White House carpet, and the outcome of the campaign has fully justified his strategy. For they gained absolutely nothing for this city and state which would not have been offered without their interposition. The amendment to the immigration bill which provides a quasi-exclusion of Japanese coolies from Pacific Coast ports as long as the Mikado sees fit to issue no passports direct to the mainland was not the outcome of any conferences between the San Francisco officials and the President; it was framed by Senator Lodge after consultation with the President and Secretary Root, and the Pacific Coast has to accept it whether it is satisfactory or the reverse. As a matter of fact at least one of the California Congressmen criticised it severely. With other objectionable sections of the immigration bill it was jammed down the throats of the Senate with threats of a characteristic Rooseveltian kind that had nothing to do with California and her difficulty. The Senate had to swallow the bill willy-nilly and the President is not likely to have accorded more consideration to the San Francisco Board of Education than to the Senate. So the only conceivable reason for calling the school directors to Washington was to obtain their assent to Japan's wishes in regard to the treatment of her children in our schools as expeditiously as possible. They went, they saw how determined the President was, they yielded.

Schmitz a Blundering Interloper

Now that the surrender is complete the school directors may come home and resume their ordinary duties with small loss of prestige. Not so the Mayor; he has blundered into more trouble by this trip to Washington than he will speedily get out of. Undertaken with the two-fold purpose of delaying his trial and of winning new honors to replace those that have fallen from him during the last year, it has only plunged him further into the slough of political difficulty while at the same time exposing him to the jibes and sneers of the Eastern newspapers. His absurd assumptions of importance and his ignorance of essential features of the problem he professed himself competent to solve have not escaped the Washington correspondents and as a consequence the whole press of the East has earned the undying hatred which Schmitz had already bestowed on the newspapers of this city. The eagle-eyed newspapermen of Washington have not failed to note that our Mayor wears his indictment with the easy air of Al Hayman of the Theatrical Trust who considers that sort of thing "a badge of success;" and they have been careful to tell how he arrogated unto himself powers plenipotentiary in dealing with the President which left the Board of Education naked of the least vestige of authority. These indications were duly reported here and inspired the wavering followers of the indicted administration with an exciting hope that the battle waged so disastrously in San Francisco was to be won in the last ditch at Washington. They recked nothing that Schmitz was an interloper who had thrust himself into the party at the last moment on the strength of a telegram which none has seen and most suspect of non-existence; it was a daring game and the end justified the means. But when the first flush of anticipated victory had died it was seen that the Mayor was wavering. His reception was not all that he had expected and he began to lose confidence in his ability to fence with the wielder of the big stick. Admonitory telegrams were hurled at his head, chief among which as a masterpiece of logic and a gem of literature must be reckoned Tveitmoe's throbbing missive about Caucasian graveyards. But the wires were crowded in vain. The Mayor went down before the President like the pins before the bowler. Now his face is turned towards the setting sun and his return will be less of a triumph than when last he hurried home. Then it was only to face a few indictments wherewith predatory wealth, the Citizens' Alliance and other malign influences sought to stain his fair name. Now he has to face the few friends whom interest and other considerations held to his side and satisfy their angry upbraidings. "He goes to save the country," sneered Ruef at his departure. He will be exceedingly lucky if he saves his own skin when the Exclusion League and the unions line up to welcome him home.

Perspective Impressions

Is Mayor Schmitz trying to get a clean bill of moral health from President Roosevelt.—Oakland Herald. What's the use? He can get that from the citizens of San Francisco every time the old one gets smudged.

In prosecuting the bribe takers let us not forget the main object which is to expose and punish the bribe givers no matter how high their station or how guarded with gold they may be.—San Jose Times. In the abstract this sentiment meets with the warm approval of the Hayes brothers.

"I shall wear wear an automobile costume. The automobile is the paramount idea of the show."—Mrs. Ynez Shorb White. To be sure! It is on the same principle that ladies wear bare backs at the horse show, the horses being undraped on those occasions. The art of dress is founded on scientific principles—sometimes.

Rev. John Cudlippe of Wichita, Kan., protests against the suppression of a single line of Thaw case testimony. He demands all the salacious details. If there are any new wrinkles for the promotion of Lesbian thrills he wants to know what they are, and he doesn't care how widely the knowledge of them is diffused. Perhaps he's a man after Stanford White's own heart.

"So it may be doubted," says the New York Sun, "whether the fear that the sixty odd Japanese school children affected by the order of the Board of Education would contaminate the white children of all nationalities in San Francisco has a very deep foundation in the consciousness of the people." Yes, it must be confessed, there is room for doubt. Our solicitude for the dear, tender little ones appears to have been—thanks to Mayor Schmitz—about skin deep.

Fate.

By R. B. Cunninghame Graham.

In a long corridor of an old Georgian house, lit by a skylight and by a window over the hall door, there hung a piece of needlework in a dark rosewood frame. In silk, some lady of the family had worked a landscape setting forth the district and the house in which the picture hung. It stood four square and looked out on the east across the moss which once had been a sea. On either side of the great strath ran lines of hills, one rough and heather-clad, as when just at their feet the Romans were rolled back, the other smooth and green, and sloping off toward the south. The moss itself was brown and on its face the shadows came and went, chasing each other as the hours pursue eternity, leaving no trace where they had passed.

Trees stood about the house and in the pictured needlework; in one case stiff and formal, looking like ineffectual monuments of grief in cemeteries, and in the other whispering in the wind, laboring and groaning in the storm, and in the sunshine all alive with bees.

The careful needlewoman had displayed each stone and window in the house; coloring those black which had been closed during the operation of the window tax, and had dwelt lovingly on walls and pediments. The range of hills under her magnifying steel had changed to mountains, and a small lake had come into existence supplied with water from the fountains of her brain. Right carefully she had devised the cedars, with the beech avenue, the sycamores, the weeping yew, and the stiff terrace upon which the house was set, whilst every post in all the fences was portrayed both with elaborate stitching and with circumstance.

Just as much inkling of perspective was employed as to make all unnatural, and yet on looking at it, you felt it had been done with tenderness, and the contriver must have put her soul into the task.

Such artless works sometimes more nearly touch the heart than the most airy flights of genius, when the place represented has been dear to the beholder and the artist; for places, unlike men, can never vary, and time itself breeds no satiety of love.

The faint, fresh smell of fir trees in the wet, the scent of dampness rising from the moss and the perfume of bracken, sweet and sharp, must have been present always to the worker as she sat sewing at her window seat, whilst gazing at the rain.

Time does not mellow needlework as it does pictures, yet still it gives it interest, and as the colors fade and ends of silk grow rough, it seems a soul is born in them which speaks to us out of its nothingness bringing us somehow nearer to the dead.

So it hung on, getting a little yellower, more fly-blown, and with the varnish sealing from the rosewood frame and the gold falling off in particles from the interior rim, as winter damp and summer sun succeeded year by year in the long corridor of the old Georgian house. Birds sat upon it now and then, and bats occasionally hid themselves between it and the wall, and darted out again as fearlessly as if the lonely passage had been an alley in a wood. Nothing appeared less likely than that a tragedy should be unrolled with it as background, or as the world, in which after the fashion of the greater world outside its frame, birth, life and death should pass all unperceived.

Life was serene as usual in the corridor, whilst the dust gathered on the picture frames and clung upon the looking-glasses as frost clings on a cabbage leaf in the late autumn after a cold night. The house itself, buried in woods, woods and more woods, stood lonely and in the avenues guttered and channeled by the winter rains, the grass grew rank. The terraces were pitted here and there with holes made by the rabbits in their play, who left a little heap of sand outside them, to which occasionally clung brown silky fur.

The roedeer, venturing from the copses, strayed in the summer nights and belled close to the windows; and the soft flying owls wafted from tree to tree like kites, or hooted litanies from the tall larches, whilst, from the woods and mosses rose the faint noises which at night wake recollections of the time when men and animals perchance all spoke one tongue.

The charm of desolation had descended on the place, and the rare lights and few inhabitants seemed to be lost in nature, which invaded them, swallowing them in her amplitude as the stray vegetation swallows up a church deserted by the Jesuits out on the Chaco or in Paraguay. Gnomons had fallen from sundials, and the stone slabs of terrace steps yawned open; from some of them sprang ferns, whilst on the coping of the walls the moss grew tenderly. The ponds were half grown up with flags and bulrushes. Great banks of sand and mud stretched into them, brought by the burns in winter, and on them feathers stuck, looking like snowflakes and fluttering in the wind. All was so quiet that the mast falling from the beech sounded like raindrops pattering upon ice or on a window-pane.

Nothing disturbed the quiet of the place, which slowly seemed to fall to ruins and to become more beautiful each day. Then, on a summer morning when the swallows darted through the trees, hawking at flies and on the grass the squirrels ventured timidly to play, springing upon the overhanging boughs at the first sudden noise, a bubble seemed to swell below the glass and force it outwards at the corner of the frame. It grew mysterious and white, next turned a rusty brown, then was forgotten as the days slipped past, each one so like the other that the flight of time was imperceptible; darkness succeeding light as stealthily as the owls floated through the wood, lighting like thistle-down on the elastic branches of the trees.

Weeks passed and still the mystery was unsolved, only beneath the envelope a fluttering motion now and then was seen, as if a spirit prisoned in its cell stirred

LITTLE CROSS, AND THE PASSING OF ELDER BEALS

The confiscation of the estates of Double Cross and Madame Josephine was more than illegal. It was unjust. There was a little flotsam waif of the cohabital wreck whose right of inheritance no one in Pickeye, even with the warped ideas of justice which prevailed there, would have thought of disputing.

Her existence was unknown perhaps to most of those who participated in the escheatment; at any rate, nobody thought of her at the time. But she was to become a very serious consideration to many persons, right soon and in the future.

The little three-year-old was asleep in her parents' apartments at the Pauvre Diable rotisserie the night of the tragedy, as unconscious of her losses as the excited town was of her existence. The first to think of her was Pierre, the proprietor of the restaurant.

"Mon dieu! la pauvre petite! ze leetle one! She ees depreeved!" he exclaimed, approaching a table where two women were taking a late supper.

"That's so," said one of the women; "no one has thought of little Mary. Where is she, Pierre?"

"Up in ze rooms."

"Poor little thing! What'll become of her, Maude?"

"I'm sure I don't know; and I don't care," replied the second woman.

"Oh, don't say that, Maude! You can't help pitying such an innocent, helpless little thing."

"Well, then, I mean that I shan't trouble myself about her. It's as much everybody else's business as mine."

"But who'll feel it to be particularly their business? The Grimshaws won't have her, of course, and they are the only decent women in town. The men wouldn't know what to do with her. And she'll wake and miss her mother—oh, it's bad enough, without there being no one to cuddle or say a kind word to her! Maude, I'm going to take her myself. I'm not a very good sort to try to fill a mother's place, but I'll do the best I can."

"You always was a fool, Dolly, and will be one to the last, so I suppose there's no use trying to talk you out of it."

"Mademoiselle Dollee, you 'ave my most profoun' respec'. Ne doutez pas! It will count—if not now, zen in ze uzzer life."

"Thank you, Pierre; I'll not doubt. Show me, please, where the little one is."

But the adoption was not to be a very lasting one. Not that the kind purpose failed or became enfeebled by the strain of fostering and amusing the child. Her winsomeness and affection repaid all this, and more—they developed what was at first merely a humane impulse into a feeling of motherhood so vivid it seemed real. There was where the trouble began; for there grew with it a yet more powerful sense of unworthiness.

The conflict had been going on in Dolly's breast for nearly a year, growing more and more insupportable, when one day, leading little Mary, she climbed the trail to Elder Beals's cabin. She had set off from town determinedly, but her purpose had been fading out all along the way. There were but a few more steps to go, when she halted irresolutely. She looked down on the town and river, at the billowy foothill ranges, and to the plains beyond that stretched away until they blended with the sky; and the remaining spark of resolution died out. In so vast a world what was her small personal worry! She returned to go back, but the tiny hand clinging to hers caused her to halt again. It wasn't personal, after all; it was for the sake of that little one, in whose soul were more illimitable possibilities than in all this sweep of vision.

She was still hesitating, thinking of the embarrassing things she must say if she held to her original design, when the door of the cabin opened and Elder Beals stood looking at her.

He was more than surprised, evidently; he seemed to be perplexing himself by an effort to recognize her. But the inspection was too brief to be confusing. With a pleasant smile, he said:

"Good day, madam. May I congratulate myself upon your having come to see me?"

"Yes, Elder Beals, that is what I came for, if you will be so kind as to listen to me a little while."

"With the greatest pleasure, madam. Come in. My abode isn't a very elegant one, but I try to make up for it by greater cordiality. Let me help your little daughter up; the step is rather high."

And without waiting for a reply he took Mary in his arms, pressed her cheek against his own, called her a darling love of a child, and stood holding her against his breast, waiting for the supposed mother to precede him into the house.

"I'm not her mother, Elder Beals. You don't know me, of course," said Dolly, hesitatingly and with great effort; "I'm one of the women that live down on the back street in Pickeye."

"Ah, yes," assented the reverend gentleman, with just a shade of surprise in his tone. "I thought you might be a new arrival. But it makes no difference. Come in; you are very welcome."

"I think I would prefer not to, if you don't mind. It seems to me it will be easier to say what I want to out here."

"Just as you like; I'll not insist against your wishes. Here is a bench under this tree. You must be tired and thirsty after your long climb; let me bring you a glass of water. And the little one may be hungry; I'll fetch some crackers and cheese, as well. There, my pretty, let me put you down beside the lady, just for a minute; I'll take you up again in a little while."

Elder Beals placed Mary on the bench, and, asking to be excused for a moment, went indoors for the refreshments. Dolly's heart, that had beaten so violently at first, was getting quieter. It wasn't going to be so difficult as she had thought it would be. She had expected to encounter austerity, if nothing harsher, on the minister's part, but thus far she had met with kindness only. Even when she had made the dreaded plunge, in announcing who she was, there had been

The Man-Sphinx and the Woman-Sphinx.

By Edward F. O'Day.

Out of Warsaw, distant, turbulent Warsaw, where the spirit of freedom, warmed at the hot blaze of revolution, is striving to spread its long-pinioned pinions, comes a gentle voice, the voice of a scholar. It is the voice of Dr. Zamenhof and it pleads with us to espouse the cause, not of revolution, but of Esperanto!

Surely a situation not devoid of humor. This champion of a universal language sits in his study and beseeches America to embrace the cult of Esperanto while all about him in the center of Polish revolutionary endeavor other champions are huddling in secret places and issuing appeals to Americans and others to embrace the cult of anarchy. It suggests one sitting on a barrel of gunpowder (the train already lighted) and all unconscious of danger, advocating with easy nonchalance the principles of Parson Wagner's Simple Life!

Esperanto! It is a fascinating plan, this, of teaching all men a tongue in which they may converse understandingly with one another. A consummation devoutly to be wished, that all men should understand one another. Then, as Dr. Zamenhof points out, all men would be brothers and the horrible strife of one nation with another would cease. Nearly all trouble springs from misunderstanding.

And this suggests something that is outside of the purpose that Dr. Zamenhof has in mind. If it is altogether desirable that man and man should understand each other, how much more desirable that man and woman should understand each other.

This is no quibbling, no mere frivolous playing with words. Frenchman and Chinese, Englishman and Greek do not speak languages mutually less intelligible than do man and woman. Frenchman and Chinese, Englishman and Greek use different words to express the same thing and the one not master of the other's word, the two are at odds unless an interpreter lend his services. But man and woman apply the same words to the same objects, the same ideas, the same feelings and yet all is confusion. For the object as it appears to the man, the idea as conceived by the man and the feeling as experienced by the man is different from the object as it appears to the woman, the idea as conceived by the woman and the feeling as experienced by the woman. Things apparently identical are O! how different.

And so it is that man may not understand woman and woman may not understand man and the two sexes go on age after age using the same words, thinking ignorantly or pretending weakly that there is a mutual understanding but all the time groping, groping, groping hopelessly in the dark, each for the other's meaning.

What man means by "love" is one thing and what woman means by "love" is altogether another thing. What man means by "passion" is one thing and what woman means by "passion" is altogether another thing. What man means by "truth" he seldom knows himself, but it is infinitely removed from what woman speaks of as "truth" and imagines "truth" to be. The "honor" and "fidelity" of man are not understood of woman; the "honor" and "fidelity" of woman are not understood of man. What man means by "eternity" and what woman means by that awful word are totally different. For thousands of years man has been worshipping "beauty," selling his soul for it or saving his soul by it, according to the point of view. For equal thousands of years woman has arrogated to herself the goddesslike privilege of personifying "beauty." She has used her idea of what "beauty" is to hold man in thrall and man has struggled so to shape his idea of "beauty" as to make the thralldom pleasant. But who will say that the one knows what the other means when this mystic word is used? As for "morality"—the word is understood by man in all its terrors; for woman it does not exist—it is a shell inclosing no idea.

Something of this was in the mind of Henri-Frederic Amiel, that gray but beautiful soul, when he wrote in his Journal Intime—"If men are always more or less deceived on the subject of woman, it is because they forget that they and women do not speak altogether the same language, and that words have not the same weight or the same meaning for them, especially in questions of feeling. Whether from shyness or precaution or artifice, a woman never speaks out her whole thought, and moreover, what she herself knows of it is but a part of what it really is. Complete frankness seems to be impossible to her, and complete self-knowledge seems to be forbidden her. If she is a sphinx to us, it is because she is a riddle of doubtful meaning even to herself. She has no need of perfidy, for she is mystery itself.

"Monstre incomprehensible" he calls her elsewhere. But he fails to say that as woman is to man, so man is to woman. To the feminine nature the masculine is also "monstre incomprehensible."

Can the veil that divides the sexes be rent asunder? Can some Esperanto or mutual language be devised so that man and woman can converse understandingly? Where is the Dr. Zamenhof who will reply to this question?

Rarely, O so rarely, the veil has been rent asunder. Once in a seeming eternity a man and a woman meet who can speak and understand. For them "truth" and "passion" and "love" and "honor" and "fidelity" and "eternity" and "beauty" have the same meanings. And all the world else (morality included) matters naught to them in this perfect mutuality of intelligence.

Patience In Oakland

Here in San Francisco where the car service has long been execrable we fancy that we are among the most abused mortals of this earth. Yet here the railroad officials abound in excuses some of which are quite plausible, but over across the bay where they are proudly attaining metropolitan proportions they have a street railroad system so badly mismanaged that it makes many a jerk-water village system look like a triumph of intellectual achievement, and one seldom hears a protest. Can it be possible that there is so radical a difference of temperament between the peoples resident on opposite sides of the bay! Is there something in the climate of Alameda county conducive to that heavenly virtue, patience, which is said to make men like gods? It seemeth so. And it is of a more highly virtuous quality than the patience which makes that more tolerable which it is impossible to prevent or eradicate. For the defects of the Oakland traction system are not irremovable. They are not in the nature of a divine penalty inflicted on the people of Oakland for their sins. They are merely the consequence of asinine mismanagement. For example the conductor who halts his car while he runs into a house up the street to obtain his basket of lunch need not be compelled to take so much exercise. Somebody should be able to devise ways and means of enabling the conductor to annex his meals without delaying his passengers. If the people of Oakland protested hard enough they might effect an improvement of the service to the extent of abating the practice of the hungry conductor. Years ago, in the little town of Santa Cruz, it was not unusual for a conductor to halt his car to enable a female passenger to match some dress goods, but in time, impatient summer visitors conceived that there was a limit at which forbearance ceased to be a virtue and thereafter the car service became less precarious. Surely what was done in Santa Cruz can be done in Oakland.

The Bridge Nuisance

But there are worse and more protracted delays in Oakland than those occasioned by the feeding habit. The cars that run from Fourteenth and Washington streets in Oakland to High Street in Alameda cross the estuary,* and quite often they encounter an open bridge. The railroad mis-manager is not to be blamed for that. The open bridge is one of the unalienable rights of the shipping industry, which is no small element in the commercial life of our sister port, but there is much that is incidental to the open bridge which I must deplore. For example I deplore the habit of opening the bridge long before it is absolutely necessary. When a boat is moving in a northerly direction and, before reaching the bridge over which the street cars are operated, must pass through the Southern Pacific draw-bridge, which is south of the county bridge, it is obviously unnecessary to open the latter bridge first. Yet that is what is usually done. It is sometimes opened ten minutes before the opening of the Southern Pacific bridge, and the street cars have been delayed at that point from twenty to forty minutes. Nevertheless the people have never mobbed the bridge-tender.

The Switch-Back Evil

I am sore aggrieved that such things should be and I wish that I could lash the dead level of Oakland thought into a tempest of protest, or, at least, inspire the people with an unwavering determination to introduce systematic railroading along with other metropolitan advantages. The untimely opening of the bridge is not the end of the chapter. Thereafter comes the switch-back evil which San Francisco has experienced in a form so mild as to be merely varioloid in comparison to what is suffered in the county across the bay. Switching back is inevitable after the bridge is opened. The other evening I was going from Oakland to High street Alameda. I was delayed twenty minutes at the bridge. When the car reached Oak street I was given a transfer to continue my journey to High, about ten blocks distant. I mounted the next car and was told to take the next. "We switch back here," said the conductor. I mounted the third. "We switch back here," said the conductor. The fourth car took me to Park street, a distance of about one hundred yards, and switched back. On the fifth car I reached my destination. This experience is not unusual. From the conductor of the fifth car I obtained the explanation of the switching back: the car men are not paid for over time in Alameda county, and when their time is up they scoot to the barn. How long would the people of San Francisco stand that kind of treatment from an opulent corporation?

Goldsmith Emasculated

Even Goldsmith has become too indelicate for the refined twentieth century ear. Therefore we must take liberties with him. The stage used to call a spade a spade but now modesty forbids. It is not easy to shock us with plays of candid carnality, nor are we too squeamish for episodes of unspeakable perversity so long as the playwright assumes a virtuous air behind the mask of art, but we draw the line at plain English when it is employed in reference to so indelicate a matter as the birth of a child. This is unfortunate. And when as a consequence we are denied the privilege of hearing the characters in "She Stoops to Conquer" speak as they spoke in Goldsmith's day it is aggravating. In that play Mrs. Harcastle makes the astonishingly brutal confession that her son Tony of whom her first husband, Mr. Lumpkin, was the father, was born. She says that he was born in bed which makes the confession doubly brutal. Nowadays children are not born. They either merely "become," or else they are presented by a stork. So Goldsmith must be toned down. The lady who played Mrs. Harcastle in Oakland last week deftly avoided the highly indelicate illusion to Tony's birth. She settled the question of her age in these words: "I was not yet twenty when I married my first husband, Mr. Lumpkin, and my son Tony has not yet come to years of discretion." Now that is what I call polite language. But it is not the language of Goldsmith, and unfortunately "She Stoops to Conquer" is distinctly a comedy of manners. It is not a dramatic masterpiece. Its merits are in proportion to its fidelity as a mirror of the society whose manner of speech and of action is reflected therein. To mutilate the dialogue of that play is to destroy the spirit of it and that is what Mr. Frohman's mimes do by more than one assault on the text. Yet Mrs. Harcastle's speech is the only one in the play which may by a conception influenced by the most rigorous standards of modesty be deemed indelicate.

Rea and the Hayes Brothers

The noblest study of mankind is man, but the study of the politician is delightfully supplementary thereto. If the Hayes brothers of San Jose may not be accepted as generic they are at least worthy of study as a type for such they really are. I have the Hayes brothers in mind because they are once more on the defensive. Jim Rea has put them there, and Jim is no raw hand in the game of politics. The current disturbance in San Jose is peculiarly characteristic of American politics and therefore it may be studied to great advantage. It is the thing that is always happening, and in it are comprised all the salient aspects of the variegated process by which government is achieved in the land of the free and the home of the brave. The disturbance in San Jose is nothing more nor less than a revolt against the municipal political machine at present manned and operated by the millionaire Hayes brothers. The head and front of the assault is "Big" Jim Rea, horticulturist and erstwhile political boss. Rea used to run the San Jose machine himself, and when he was at the wheel he scorned kid gloves and a sanctimonious air. He was a frankly conventional boss, and he detested reformers and purists. His power was often disputed and he was shorn of it by John McKenzie, but by methods that were strictly within the legitimate lines of political endeavor. The methods which now prevail and against which he revolts were imported into this state by the Hayes brothers, one of whom is now a member of Congress and the other an aspirant for gubernatorial honors.

The Evolution of Reformers

The Hayes brothers came out of Missouri where they have an iron mine which keeps them supplied with easy money. When they entered San Jose it was to become exponents of the Hearst doctrine: if thou cravest political preferment get thee to a newspaper. They bought a morning and an evening journal and then proceeded to uplift the benighted of the prune belt. From the start they were strong for reform in county politics, and by way of vindicating their sincerity of purpose they built a church and became active in the propagation of religion. Before long they were recognized as the foremost exemplars of true piety in all the county, and when they set themselves the task of cleaning the Augean stables occupied by the public servants every civic patriot for miles around responded to the call of decency. The practical politicians were swept out of office and they were kept out until it seemed expedient to the Hayes brothers in the furtherance of their political ambition to build up a powerful machine out of as many elements as they could contrive to coalesce. For the compassing of their purpose they adopted a most conciliatory policy, repressing with admirable tact every prejudice that, as intensely pious men, they must have felt tugging at their heart strings.

The Science of Combinations

Government, said Rousseau, is only a science of combinations. The Hayes brothers are exponents of that science. By a judicious blending of religious zeal with the subtle stratagems peculiar to the science of politics, and with their own newspapers to commend their own virtues and to monopolize the field of publicity, the Hayes brothers acquired all the privileges of Suzerainty over the feudalized county of Santa Clara, and then proceeded to make their huge machine a factor in the politics of state. What could be more significant, what could give greater emphasis to the fallacy that government may be perfected by rules of conduct, direct primaries and such things, than the demonstration given us by the Hayes brothers of the feasibility of making principles of freedom and justice subserve private and selfish ends? Religion is the guide of government; the Hayes brothers made a church the appanage of their political equipment. The press is the palladium of our liberties, mightiest of the mighty means, man's rights to enforce his wrongs to redress; the Hayes brothers assimilated this potent force—a case of hitching the palladium of our liberties to the load-star of government. You can't beat that with a Direct Primary law. The Hayes brothers have been pronounced Tartuffish but one of them is in Congress and the other is in training for the gubernatorial job. Their friends insist that they are great civic patriots and that the end aimed at—control of the politics of the states—will justify the means, because when E. O.

(Black) is Governor and E. A. (Red) is in the Senate, they will proceed to lead the people of California out of the bondage of Harriman. But the impatient people of Santa Clara County are not to be tranquillized by such a prospect. With the Hayes brothers running their government and the Hayes brothers running the newspapers the only source from which criticism of the government was available, the people felt that it was a case of too much Hayes, and so when Charley Shortridge returned to San Jose and started a rival paper he was welcomed with open arms. The opposition to the Hayes brothers is expressed in the advertising columns of the Times, the Shortridge paper, and Charley is growing affluent once more.

Politics and Ideals

A reformer has been defined to be a programmer in embryo, and that conception has been verified by the Hayes brothers. From austere and conspicuously pious proponents of purification in politics they have become performers of the most tolerant type. They now play the game of politics with all the bars down and Abe Ruef in the dealer's chair. Notwithstanding their rigid private morality so broad-minded are they that San Jose has been run as a wide-open town under their auspices; and while it may have been without their knowledge, money has been freely used as a persuader at the polls for the safeguarding of the machine. The conversion of these gentle reformers to the ways that are devious of the practical politician is a phenomenon worthy of investigation. It has been said that there is something about private morality which is incompatible with successful cultivation of state craft, and it is quite possible that the Hayes brothers have been convinced of the truth of this dictum. There can be no doubt of the soundness of their private morality. They are unquestionably good men in all their private and commercial relations with their fellow men, but in politics they consort with Abe Ruef and if they do not publicly endorse they at least blink at methods that are not consistent with the religious ideals for which they profess ardent admiration but to which they are not slaves. That is a circumstance, however, of little significance. They may have discovered, as others have, that ideals are burdensome possessions that sometimes rise to the level of serious inconveniences. At any rate they are guiltless of the folly of bringing ideals into politics.

Ways That Are Dark

While it would be a perversion of diligence to formulate standards of behaviour for politicians, there are certain well established standards by which they are judged, and with those in mind we cannot but reprehend the doings of the Hayes brothers' henchmen. The simplicity of the good people of San Jose had been undermined long before the Hayes brothers took the saddle, but it cannot be pleaded in behalf of the millionaires from Missouri that they regenerated the community. The vote-buying industry flourishes now as it formerly did and the old-time politicians say that the staple of politics is so far beyond their financial capacity owing to the cheapness of money on election days that they have quit the market. The Hayes brothers cannot be held accountable for the ultimate purpose to which money is devoted, but the fact remains that the erstwhile reformers now number among their satellites experienced performers skilled in the tricks that postulate an easy conscience. This may be accounted for on the theory that their guilelessness is imposed upon, or on the hypothesis that in their physical equipment is a defect which incapacitates them from comprehending the potentialities for evil in the political game. No man is absolutely sound physically and intellectually. Some men have imperfect physical vision, and some imperfect moral vision. The ethical sense is missing in some men, as in some there is missing the sense of humor. There was an editor once who couldn't appreciate a joke even though it appeared in his own paper. So when a reporter describing an egg of abnormal size said that it had all been laid by one hen, the editor summoned him and asked if he really supposed that two hens could lay a single egg between them. Now the Hayes brothers may be able to see a joke between them, but it is quite possible that while therefore, they may appreciate the infinite comedy in the present situation in San Jose with Jim Rea in the role of reformer keeping them busy getting crooked politicians out of jail, still it may be quite impossible for them to comprehend the ethical impropriety of trying to abate the choler of the current political Saint of the county by hiring his son for the defense and at the same time trying to disarm Charley Shortridge by engaging as one of the counsel his boon companion and chief editorial writer, John E. Richards.

A Call for Gayley

Professor Gayley of Berkeley has been scheduled for a course of lectures on the drama and I fervently hope that he will take up the subject of Wilde's "Salome" and tell us what he thinks about it. I have an opinion about "Salome," but it may not coincide with Professor Gayley's, and I doubt whether, if Professor Gayley dissented from my opinion, he would cause me to distrust the soundness of my views. But if Professor Gayley were to agree with me then would I gladly welcome him to the fold; for the Professor carries some weight—in Berkeley, and by his dictum he can silence small-fry critics. And there are critics that are badly in need of being silenced if not squelched. And I indulge the notion that if there are critics of literature who should be given their quietus the hired intellectuals of the State University should religiously attend to that business. When there are pests bothering the farmers of the state the agricultural experts of Berkeley respond to the call for pest eradicators. When pestiferous critics are burrowing under the foundations of the Temple of Art, why should the Gayley's of Berkeley sulk in their tents? Why shouldn't they come forth panoplied for intellectual combat and with the burnished weapons of their wit put the enemy to flight?

Aspects of Art

Notwithstanding my convictions respecting "Salome" I am not unconscious of the fact that the play presents a fine academic question which may be argued with great force from the standpoint of those who believe that art of this brand is unwholesome. But this question is one that touches the very fundamentals of art. Those fundamentals have been the subject of controversy for many years and from difference of opinion respecting them several schools of art have sprung. The object of art, as Professor Gayley knows, is beauty, but respecting the constituents of beauty all critics do not agree. Oscar Wilde belonged to what is known as the Decadent School of Art, the school of Baudelaire and Verlaine and Pater and Wagner and Nietzsche and Maeterlinck and Liszt and Richard Strauss. Yet his "Salome" is being adjudged according to the standards of Goethe of Schiller of Hugo of Dickens of Beethoven of Raphael of da Vinci and Michaelangelo. In other words "Salome" is being adjudged by the standards which recognize as true art only such art as satisfies the religious consciousness of the times. The art of Oscar Wilde claimed for its domain the whole heart and nature and soul and passions of men. This art may be unwholesome since it substitutes esthetical ideals for the ideals of Christianity, but it is not more vicious than the philosophy of Christian ministers who deny the essentials of Christian dogma. There is no protest against their unwholesome philosophy but there is protest against one of its logical consequences—the art of such men as Wilde and Baudelaire and Verlaine. Moreover there is no protest against the music of Wagner or the poetry and painting of the Decadents, yet they are the products of the same school of art of which Oscar Wilde was an exponent.

Its Unwholesomeness

Some critics approach "Salome" with certain preconceived notions of Wilde's purpose as a playwright influenced by their knowledge of his unfortunate career, and being in a receptive mood for an impression they receive it felicitously. For them the play reeks with the lust of the daughter of Herodias. The impregnable piety of the saint who walked boldly to his death heaping anathema on the heads of sinners escapes them altogether. The glorification of renunciation holds naught of interest to them. But all this, it may be said, only goes to show that the play is unwholesome. If it does then the nude in art is unwholesome for it affects some persons just as "Salome" affects some critics. Morality is largely a matter of discipline. It consists for some in the facts of a situation or the words of a speech; but for others, only in the spirit of the work.

"The Song of Songs"

From the theatrical reporter of a morning daily, Mr. Colgate Baker, I learn with amazement that "Salome" is a play that deals with perverted sexual instincts and that it was a bestial passion that was conceived for John the Baptist. I wish Professor Gayley would attend to Baker and warn him against the impropriety of developing an instinct for finding things that don't exist. Perhaps Professor Gayley will be so kind as to inform Mr. Baker that the daughter of Herodias merely typifies the ultra passionate females of her day. Perhaps, also he will kindly suggest that when Oscar Wilde was putting into the mouth of Salome her remarkable and perfervid apostrophes to the prophet he had the Bible before him and merely paraphrased the language of "The Song of Songs" which has been pronounced the gospel of love. This, however, is purely a notion of mine, and I express it in the hope that our eminent literary authority, Professor Gayley, will compare "The Song of Songs" with the dialogue in Wilde's plays and tell us what he thinks about the similarity of imagery, of expressions and the reproduction of spirit. Moreover I desire to recommend the perusal of "The Song of Songs" to our virtuous young daily newspaper critics who are shocked by the language of Salome. To them also I would recommend the perusal of Renan's "Life of Christ" so that they may familiarize themselves with St. John the Baptist and reflect whether it is not quite probable that the playwright's motive was to exploit the martyrdom of the hermit and to impress us pictorially with the profound depravity into which the world had fallen when Christ came to preach the religion of renunciation. Why think only of the sexual fever of Salome by which Wilde exemplifies the law of contrast? That law is essential to good drama. Why lose sight of the passion of revenge? Does that not animate Salome as much as anything else? "It is of my mother he is speaking," says Salome when she first hears the prophet. It was not pleasant for her to hear her mother called hard names. Nor was it pleasant to be bitterly repulsed. When Salome kissed the lips of the severed head she does not articulate as one of the Stanford White type of females, but as a tigress triumphant in the fall of her enemy. "Thy tongue," she says, "that scarlet viper that spat its venom on me: it moves no more. Thou didst speak evil words of me as to a harlot. Well I still live but thou art dead and thy head belongs to me. I can do with it what I will. I can throw it to the dogs and the birds of the air." This is not the language of perverted love. It is the language of hatred, the language of the woman scorned who lived two thousand years ago. The language of love which Wilde gives us is the language of Solomon of the Odalisques and the Shulamite.

His Purpose

Much has been said of Wilde's purpose. Primarily his purpose was artistic perfection; that and nothing more. Read Wilde's works and you will find that he was above all things an artist, actuated by the artist's joy in the triumphs of his genius, and mindful never of the feelings of the mob but only of those who have the same reverence for art that he had. Wilde thought there was nothing finer in the world than imagination. He worshiped Christ not because he believed him to be the son of God but because he was convinced that Christ had more imagination than any man that ever lived. Writing in anguish in his cell he tells us that it was not Christ's aim to turn an interesting thief into a tedious honest man. And what he conceived to be the attitude of Christ toward an interesting thief was due in his opinion solely to imagination. One of the principal objections to "Salome" is that it is not a faithful dramatization of a Biblical story. I mention this because it indicates the general character of the adverse criticism that has been evoked by the play. It is an objection that bears out what George Bernard Shaw says of us: that the play is beyond our intelligence; for surely if the very element which makes for the triumph of poetic genius is objectionable to us, the imagination that soared beyond the domain of fact to give us a plausible story of passion and make the tragedy of art more tragic than reality, then indeed are we guilty as charged. This sort of criticism reminds me of the cant that greeted "The Pilgrims Progress." "Loose atheistical wits," said the learned critics of the day, "might write such stuff to divert the painted Jezebels of the Court, but it must not be put before us." In time the people were educated up to Bunyan. Perhaps in time we shall be educated up to Wilde. So far we have not finished jeering at the name of Wilde. In nearly every other civilized country profound is the reverence in which is held the memory of the man who in his day bulked larger in the public eye than any of his contemporaries. That poor wretch who was condemned to hell before his time they now liken unto a star which, fascinated by its own reflection in some stagnant marsh fell down, was besmirched and became extinct ere it could soar aloft again.

Refugees on Exhibition

Ingleside Camp is rapidly becoming the Sunday show place of the city for those who are interested in the way the human relics of the big fire are being handled by the Relief Committee. Last Sunday several thousand visitors from the bay towns and numbers of Eastern tourists thronged the grounds and asked questions. The refugees, the camp itself and the way it is managed, constitute something unique. Probably its like will never be seen again, for contingencies arising from such unusual distress as that brought about by the great quake are fortunately of rare occurrence. The big stables of the Ingleside track have been transformed into clean, warm and comfortable sleeping quarters for the inmates. There are certainly no public grounds and very, very few private grounds that are kept as clean, spic and span and as orderly. Hygeia herself must be at the head of the assistants, for everything is sterilized and disinfected from the water that is drunk to the ocean breezes that blow through the ventilators in the dormitories. No microbe could ever hope to run the picket line of anti-germicides that surrounds the place. It's the hardest refugee camp in the city to handle because the inmates are all old, the average being 65, the oldest 98 years old, and yet by reason of care, sharp discipline and attention to details there have been no deaths.

Some of the Features

The camp was started under military discipline, as far as the handling of camps in a hygienic way is concerned, and the system has prevailed. But the gray haired inmates have a comfortable and an entertaining time of it: the women have their sewing bees where they are given one of every two garments they make, the materials being furnished them free. The men have their big reading-room and small jobs parcelled out to the most active, such as vegetable gardening, teaming, dormitory work, brushing up the grounds and the like. In this way they contribute to a slight degree in keeping down the expense. Sanitary conditions are only one of many problems when six hundred and twenty destitute old people are to be handled physically, mentally and morally on public contributions. But the camp has friends that help out in the work most needed, mentally and spiritually. There are a number of society girls who run out there during the week and render assistance in interesting cases. The Trinity Church Club does a deal in lightening the sorrows of the distressed. The Catholic Church mothers those of its faith most tenderly, The League of the Cross band plays regularly in the big Social Hall to the great delight of the old folks. And once a week the home talent takes possession of the stage and turns loose its best stunts.

Madame Melba and Her Son in the Del Monte Coach

There is a story going the rounds of the Sunday Supps that on her last visit to this Coast Madame Melba heard that her son, George Armstrong, whom she deserted when he was a baby, was working on a farm in Oregon and that she sent for him and they were united in this city. It is true that Armstrong was on an Oregon farm and that he came to this city to meet his mother but it is not true that she deserted him in his babyhood, or that their meeting in this city was the first since their separation in Australia. A friend of Madame Melba's, who knew her in Australia, informs me that she educated her son. She did not desert him but she divorced his father, her marriage having been a most unhappy one. Melba, or Nellie Mitchell, as

Thrift Nipped In the Bud

Twice a week a big phonograph is turned on by the inmate who saved it from the fire. It's the one big amusement feature of the camp and the old folks never tire listening to it. The other day the owner, after reading in the morning paper about the everlasting money making of the trusts, came to the conclusion after a great deal of deliberation that if properly worked he had a cinch on the phonograph trust business of the camp. Accordingly he officially announced to the surprised management that he thought his services were worth seventy-five cents an hour and that a three-hour concert thereafter would be just two dollars and twenty-five cents. "Quite right," was the answer. "Your show is popular and you're entitled to every cent you can get out of it." The refugee impresario of the phonograph began to smile and softly rub his hands when he was suddenly shocked with a—"But, hereafter your bed and board in this camp will cost you just two dollars and twenty-five cents a day when the phonograph doesn't spiel according to past programmes. No phonograph: no meals. That's the ultimatum." The concerts are going on as usual and it is needless to say without special pay. The aged impresario now scans the files of all the old papers he can find in the vain endeavor to discover what a trust does when shocked with such an ultimatum.

McPike As a Fighter

Attorney H. C. McPike is a man quick as a flash to resent anything he considers in the way of a slight.

The Severn, at 1050 Geary street, is a delightfully appointed restaurant.

He has an exceptionally fine talent for getting legal business and he gave a notable exhibition of it when he west East and succeeded in paving the way for Delmas's entrance into the Thaw case, a case that is becoming as notable for the jealousies of counsel as for its sensational evidence. Having added the Thaw case to his laurels McPike was not the man to quietly sit by under the contemptuous glances of Attorneys Hartridge, O'Reilly, Gleason and Peabody. The sentiment that snapped the tension was voiced by Hartridge when he said: "McPike never was retained in any capacity in this case and has no more to do with the defense than any other spectator. To date his chief activity has been confined to filling a chair at the counsel table and doing errands for Delmas."

Hot Shot In Reply

Fancy any one who knew McPike firing a shot like that at him. Hartridge has not recovered from the return volley yet. The California attorney at once put himself on record in a red hot interview with a Herald reporter in which he expressed in forceful language his opinion of the extravagantly petty jealousies of the New York counsel and the evil effect their bickerings were having on the defense. A characteristic of McPike is that when he turns loose, as he did in this instance, he strives to cancel all his resentment in full. He lashed out in a way that those who were struck will never forget. If there are any she was known in Australia, was the daughter of a wealthy Melbourne contractor, and she had considerable vocal training before she went to Europe. But she was a natural singer who acquired even the knack for coloratura without instruction. As a child she used to trill and her girl companions were always begging her to make "those noises in her throat." After her trouble with her husband she gave concerts in Australia where she had long been known as a church choir singer. Then she went to Paris, where, after receiving a few lessons from Madame Marehesi, she was introduced to the public and was pronounced the greatest of prima donnas. The photographs reproduced above were taken at Monterey. Young Armstrong was married in London last December and his mother gave him a castle in Ireland and an annuity of $7,500 a year.

stubborn fighters among the Gleason-Hartridge combination the end is not yet, for certainly McPike will not be the first to quit. Hartridge made an effort to get Delmas to throw McPike overboard but the latter emphatically refused.

Dunne on the Situation

I should like to have seen the smile gradually illuminating the features of Attorney Peter Dunne as he read deeper and deeper into the newspaper report of McPike's answer to Hartridge and his mates. I'll wager it ended in a chuckle of delight. Dunne knows McPike thoroughly and appreciates the stubborn fighting streak in his make-up. The two were partners here a decade ago. In the run of time Dunne was given the overflow damage cases from the S. P. law office to help out the elder Barnes. He made such a fine record in holding down judgments that the railroad one day added him to its staff. He has advanced in the office till now he is among the leading counsel. Dunne and McPike severed their partnership when the former cast his fortunes with the railroad.

The Troublesome Brigham

"I hear," writes my Hawaiian correspondent, "that there has been some very warm correspondence of late between Charles R. Bishop, formerly of Honolulu, but now of San Francisco, and the trustees of the Bishop

Museum of Polynesian Antiquities in Honolulu. The museum was founded by the late Princess Bernice Pauahi, wife of Charles R. Bishop, and the latter has very generously enlarged the endowment. The museum is under the management of a board of trustees, and the Director of it is Mr. W. T. Brigham, a boyhood friend of Mr. Bishop's. Brigham is neither a scientist nor a scholar. But he has a most prodigious amount of information on a wonderfully wide variety of subjects. He has also the knack and mechanical resourcefulness of the Yankee jack-of-all-trades. These two qualities made him a very valuable man in the early days of the museum. Before either its collections or its endowment were as large as they are now he used to collect ethnological or natural history specimens, mount them, classify them and label them. He could set the type and print the catalogues of the institution. He could do carpentry on occasion. He was the entire staff of the museum in those days, and a fairly efficient one too. But Brigham is inclined to be pragmatical and unfortunately he has some very strong prejudices which, by reason of the rein that he gives them lead him into difficulties from which he is always extricated by Mr. Bishop, whose loyalty is inexhaustible. The Hawaiian character is not held by Mr. Brigham in high esteem, and the memory of Father Damien is to him a fit subject of reprobation. As he sometimes gives expression to his feelings on these subjects he excites the aversion not only of those whose cherished sentiments are violated but also of those that are intolerant of the intolerance that takes the hue of bigotry. There is a portrait of Father Damien in the museum and when visitors ask about the man whose noble character inspired the pen of Robert Louis Stevenson in one of its loftiest flights, Director Brigham turns loose with great zest. Complaint has been frequent of Brigham's animadversions but when the trustees take notice Mr. Bishop comes to the rescue."

Brigham Versus Bryan

"The latest complaint against Director Brigham was made by William Alanson Bryan who has been curator of the department of ornithology in the museum for several years and as such has done an immense amount of field work in the Pacific. Some time ago it occurred to him that because of the rapid changes now going on in the Pacific, a complete ethnological and natural history survey of the islands of the Pacific just at this time would be of the highest value. Material could be secured now that is perishing rapidly. He decided to solicit assistance for the founding of a great scientific institution here in Honolulu having for its primary purpose many important surveys and the establishment of laboratories for scientific research and discovery; an institution that would be at once a comprehensive school for training in field work and in original research. Having matured his plans, he resigned from the museum and traveled through the East and England interesting scientists and men of means in the proposed institution. If not altogether successful the encouragement he received was of the most flattering kind. But not everywhere was he received cordially, for letters from Brigham preceded him and they were not filled with encomiums. So Bryan hastened home and demanded an explanation. The trustees waxed indignant. Bryan's friends said that Brigham was jealous; that he thought his old subordinate would win too much glory. The trustees were asked to suppress Brigham. Then the correspondence with Bishop was opened, and Bishop pleaded again for the friend of his boyhood. The trustees finally adopted a few more rules designed to keep Brigham from breaking out, and then to affirm their confidence in Bryan they appointed him curator of ornithology once more and gave him leave to push along his pet enterprise.

Fairbank's Hospitality

I observe from the dispatches that the Tall Sycamore of the Wabash entertained our Mayor at dinner last Sunday. But this is not to be wondered at, for the hospitality of the Vice-President is becoming almost notorious nowadays. Since the Bee has been buzzing around and about the Fairbanksian bonnet the extreme sociability of the V. P. has become one of the wonders of Washington. No one who may control a handful of votes is found unworthy of the hospitality of the mansion now secondary in prestige only to the White House. So the crafty V. P. knows what he is about when he beams upon our Mayor with the strained for warmth of his near-geniality, for has not Samuel Gompers seen fit to tend 'Gene a reception in the name of the Union Labor of the District of Columbia. But here is a secret that may only be whispered—Sam is accused by Labor Leader Tveitmoe of being decidedly weak-kneed on the subject of Jap exclusion. However this fact will not harm the Tall Sycamore, who through his dinner may thus ingratiate himself both with Labor and with Boss Ruef.

BRIGHT THINGS THAT COME WITH SPRING

Spring '07 finds the western world enjoying prosperity without precedent. Nor was there ever a time in history when there was so much democracy, so much human equality.

No longer do the greater number of the people have to be content with bare necessities of life. No longer is all that is luxurious the perquisite of the rich.

Broadly speaking, all are rich today. All can afford to enjoy the good things of life—the liberal table, the stylish dress, the best in art and literature and the period of leisure.

THE RESULT OF PROSPERITY

The natural result of these happy conditions is the organization of such stores as that of TAFT & PENNOYER. Here all are welcome and here will always be found the best the world affords in our lines. And the prices will be such as all can afford to pay.

The Reasons Why

Nervous Prostrationists whose peace has been invaded by the trolley may be interested to learn that the recurrent jar made by the heavy cars is a source of great uneasiness likewise to the United Railroads. The rhythmical thump-thump means the wrecking of the expensive cars so hastily substituted for the cable. Cars afflicted with the thumps have what is known among carmen as "flat wheels." It is thus explained. The descent of heavy grades on sanded rails causes the wheels, which are locked by air brakes, to wear away a portion of their surface at certain points. Thereafter the jar of contact between the flat places and the rails causes the slipping brakes to catch, so that more is worn away. The uneven wheels then proceed to shake the running gear of the cars to pieces as well as to affect the integrity of the coach itself. Another source of annoyance to company and passengers is the "grounding" of cars in cases where dry dust, being a non-conductor, prevents the current from being fed from the wheels to the rails. In every instance the current jumps to the car's iron work so that a passenger standing upon earth that may be damp and therefore a conducting material receives a sharp shock from the iron stanchions in attempting to mount the car. The United Railroads, incidentally, has removed many outside seats, not to give more standing room but because they have not a sufficient number of mechanics to keep broken seats in repair.

A Cruel Thrust

What does John Partridge mean by aspersing the characters of literary men? As a candidate for mayor Partridge was the author of divers epigrams and axioms having to do with economics and municipal ethics that argued him a man of no mean literary ability himself, so it is hard to understand how he came to cast the slur upon the ancient and honorable guild of authors that left Judge Mogan aghast and roused the chivalrous soul of Carl Lindsay. It was in a divorce hearing and the plaintiff sought release from her marital ties because of her husband's attentions to other men's wives. Now the husband offered to his spouse an ingenious if not entirely convincing explanation of his tarrying until eleven o'clock at night in the home of another woman—he was engaged in literary work and hired a room away from home in order that he might burn a scholar's candle there in the company of his muse. With the intention of eliciting this explanation (in itself not unworthy the imagination of a novelist) Carl Lindsay asked the wife: "Your husband is a man of literary attainments, is he not?" And then John Partridge—"Is that offered as an excuse for adultery or as a reason for it?" It was an unkind thrust at the brethren of the pen and Carl Lindsay who boasts a diction not incomparable with that which enrolled Edmund Burke among the greatest of lettered men, was quick to vindicate the profession. "Oh no," he said, "literary men are not the only ones who indulge in that pastime." Stern moralists may question the propriety of characterizing adultery as a pastime, but otherwise it was a noble defense and all men of literary attainments are indebted to Lindsay for his championship.

Artists to Go East

Evidently the fever of ambition which breaks out at intervals among the newspaper artists of this city is epidemic again, for four have turned their thoughts towards New York and as a consequence two of our newspapers have suffered a serious loss. "Rube" Goldberg, the clever sporting cartoonist who took Tad's place on the Bulletin when the latter was tempted eastward by the lure of the Hearst papers has resigned his position and is already in New York looking around for an opening. The Bulletin showed

Where Dependability and Economy Meet

These are the great foundation stones of Cadillac success—unfailing reliability under all sorts of service; cost of maintenance so low as to be almost incredible. In the magnificent line of Cadillacs for 1907 these qualities are more manifest than ever before. The Model H has proven itself the four-cylinder triumph of the year.

From motor to muffler this machine is an example of simple construction, of finish really superfine, of accuracy not surpassed in any other mechanical creation—all of which are more pronounced because of the wonderful factory facilities and system that stand behind the its appreciation of Goldberg's work by offering him a flattering advance of salary, but Goldberg wants a larger field and persisted in his intention of seeking his fortune in New York. Bert Igoe is to be the next to cast his lines in the metropolis. He has had the fever for some time and has finally decided that he can stay on this edge of the continent no longer. I understand that Hearst has offered him a big salary if he will join Tad on the New York Journal, but Igoe has not yet made up his mind to accept. New York is a big field and he may find an opening more to his liking. The other two artists who are to abandon the local field are Miss Laura Foster and Miss Donna Fulton. These two clever women left the Bulletin when the Sunday Supp was dropped recently and immediately began laying plans for an advance on the artistic center of America. They will leave on the first of April with a sheaf of letters calculated to open the mystic sancta of the big magazine editors. Judging by the success of Tad, Harry Raleigh and others from this city, not to mention Davenport, Edgren, Swinnerton and the rest of the earlier exiles, the last four to go will never regret that ambition spurred them out of the West.

The Merchant Tailors' Association has resolved that the Tuxedo must not be worn when ladies are present. What tyrants these tailors are becoming!

The press dispatches tell us that Viscount Hayashi, the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs, is firm for peace. But this news is not half so important as would be positive information respecting the temperament of our Japanese and Korean Exclusion League. Whenever the roar of resounding tongues is wafted from the headquarters of that organization there is panic in the Bourse and consternation in Wall street.

The sapient gentleman sitting up aloft in the office of the Sacramento Union vouchsafes a suggestion for the benefit of the arbitrators of the issue between the United Railroads Company and the carmen: "The sensible thing is for all hands to be sensible and then the entanglement will unravel all right." Now let us hear from Ella Wheeler Wilcox on How to be Sensible When to Be Otherwise is Foolish.

"If I were a Thaw juror," says the Rev. Thomas Gregory, a contemporary of Ella Wheeler Wilcox, "I would vote to let the defendant go free. And this I would do in obedience to a higher command than any mere human ordinance." Will somebody please ask this ordained ass to quote for us the higher command by which he is directed to find Stanford White guilty on the testimony of Evelyn Nesbit Thaw.

Culturing Up the Crockers

Mrs. Will Crocker is determined that her children shall be cultured, and the extent to which they will absorb culture depends entirely on their capacity. Of opportunity and means they are to have a plentitude. Last summer Mrs. Crocker engaged an Oxford tutor to spend several months with her boys at a chateau which she rented for the season in France. And now I hear she is negotiating with Miss Wynne Matthieson to spend the summer months with her children so that they may have the benefit of her diction and broad-English accent. But I can hardly credit the report that Miss Matthieson will condescend to act as a governess, for she is an actress of considerable ability. She was Ben Greet's leading woman when that distinguished purveyor of dramatic culturine presented "Everyman" in New York. When he took to the provinces Constance Crawley succeeded Miss Matthieson in the leading roles of the sceneless drama. Mrs. Crocker's daughter, who is now sixteen years of age, is studying the vocal art with Jean de Reszke, but not for a stage career, her friends say, which probably means that she has not the musical temperament very highly developed.

The Borels are Coming

The Borel family will all be back in town within a year, I hear. They have a severe case of homesickness that not even the beautiful scenery around their chateau can assuage. Miss Lupita is to make her long heralded debut, Alice and Sophy are to be married with éclat, and society therefore has something worth while to look forward to, for the Borels are the most sumptuous entertainers in local society. First they decided to have a double wedding but upon second thought the argument in favor of separate ceremonies prevailed. By no means unmixed are the feelings with which society is looking forward to these nuptials, for while they will doubtless be great spectacular events they will entail considerable expense, and our exclusives have not yet abandoned those economical habits acquired immediately after the fire. Rent rolls have not yet been re-established. The Borels have long been the most generous givers of wedding presents, and the days of reckoning are now coming with a vengeance.

An Attractive Bachelor

The Borels came out of the April disaster almost unscathed financially, and consequently their social importance will be greater than ever. In the circumstances Miss Lupita should be an object of great interest. What a time the bavardes will have rummaging their vocabulary for adjectives to emphasize their flattery! And how strenuous will be the efforts of match making mammas to prevail upon Antone Borel Jr. to take an interest in their daughters! So far Antone has proved most adroit in evading the matrimonial drag net. He promises to be as elusive as Dr. Harry Tevis. I am told that he already controls a large fortune, and of course he will inherit another, so he is therefore one of the most desirable of eligible society men. But he has a distaste for the boredom of the elect with its interminable artificialities. It was with the greatest difficulty that his sisters persuaded him to go to dances. He is a very interesting and affable young man, and in appearance bears no resemblance to his sisters who are so much alike in form and feature that for years it was difficult to distinguish them. Society used to have a hard time differentiating them. Walter Hobart was one of the unfortunates who always mixed his Borels.

Merely a Rumor

According to rumor the engagement of Margaret Newhall and Frank Houghtelling which was declared broken has been sent to one of Cupid's expert menders and is "just as good as new." I have tried to verify this report but those who should know declare that there is no foundation for it. Shortly after the crack was discovered in their engagement cup Mr. Houghtelling went to Europe, where Miss Newhall was traveling with her mother, and it was thought then that the trouble might be patched up. But the young man returned here some time ago without a renewed promise and now comes this report that the engagement is once more on.

The Cast for the Wedding

Invitations are out for the marriage of Charlotte Wilson and George Cadwalader. They will be married on Saturday, the second of March, at the Wilson home on California street. The details of the wedding are under lock and key but a little burglar bird who loves to pick the lock on such secrets whispered to me that the maid of honor will be Emily Wilson and the bridesmaids Jennie Crocker, Lucy King, Linda Cadwalader and Mary Keeney. Gertrude Josselyn was asked to serve as an attendant but had to refuse on account of the trip to Europe which the Josselyns are taking en famille. It is to be a pink wedding, the bridesmaids voting for that shade in preference to blue, which Miss Wilson affects a great deal.

Miss Crocker's Comical Stunt

Society is still talking about the wonderful imitation of a monkey which Jennie Crocker gave at the Mardi Gras ball at Burlingame. The costume was as cunningly contrived as any of the conceits in the "Wizard of Oz." Miss Crocker is small and very agile and the stunts she did were bewilderingly like the real thing. When unmasking time came she slipped out and reappeared pink-coated in a hunting costume the duplicate of Mrs. Walter Martin's. Most of the guests thought that someone had held up a zoo for a real monkey and Walter Martin was generally accused of importing an exponent of the Darwinian theory. Only Miss Crocker's very intimates know the dash of dare devilry in her make-up, so few suspected that she had the temerity to enact the simian role.

The Severn, at 1050 Geary street, is a delightfully appointed restaurant.

Olga, of the Paris Millinery, 1703 California street, has just returned from the East with a full line of handsome spring millinery. Her opening will be announced shortly.

Some of the Costumes

Mrs. Lansing Kellogg, who as Ethyl Hager had become a sort of professional thriller at these affairs, did not appear and the only costume that approached her standard was Miss Crocker's. Mrs. Fred McNear, who can give society a neat little thrill when she chooses, was a conventional blue and white Folly. Her sister, Mrs. Gus Taylor, who abhors fancy dress, is living up to her vow never to do the short skirt, fluffy act. She has a handsome brocade in sixteenth century style which she wears to every en masque affair and which she declares will have to do service through all the seasons that come and go. It is sort of a stage "prop" like Mrs. Carolan's "Sorceress" gown which she had designed after Mrs. Patrick Campbell's creation. Mrs. Carolan seldom appears at any function in a gown which she has worn before, but she is so enamored of this Sorceress costume that she has appeared at three fancy dress balls in it.

There are several girls in society who profit by Mrs. Carolan's aversion to encoring a full dress gown. After she has appeared once or twice in a frock it is passed on to a favorite. Mrs. Gus Spreckels is another very wealthy woman who does not use her wardrobe until it is frayed at the edges and then try to sell it. She frequently sends frocks all the way from Paris to friends out here whose purse strings do not permit sartorial extravagances. A matron whose beautiful gowns—one pearl gray velvet in particular with the Paquin touch written all over it—have been much admired this season is said to be under obligations to Mrs. Gus Spreckels' generosity.

Miss Morgan, Architect

Berkeley is very proud of Miss Julia Morgan, the woman architect, to whom the Law brothers turned over the Fairmont Hotel last May. The work on the structure has been completed under her supervision and has tried out woman's worth as an architect. Miss Morgan is perhaps the only California woman who has adopted a supposedly masculine profession and has succeeded by a man's standard. Her work has from the first been recognized by the fraternity but so quietly and unostentatiously has it been done that the general public has scarcely heard of her. Fancy what an opportunity for frenzied newspaper boosting when the Fairmont was turned over to a woman. I confess that it was only the other day that I heard of the fact myself. Miss Morgan is a Berkeley girl who studied in Paris and was considered one of the most promising architects ever graduated from the great Beaux Arts.

The Genius of White

Apropos of architects I heard a number of the craft discussing the proposed fund for the restitution of Stanford White's good name. The general opinion among the local architects is that it is a mistaken movement, as the work of Stanford White the artist can never be impaired by the reputation of Stanford White the man. The great French, German, English and even the Russian architectural reviews have brought out whole numbers devoted to the work of Stanford White and he is generally conceded to be one of the commanding geniuses of this century. In none of the reviews that I have read in foreign papers is any mention made of the manner of his death and his connection with the present case, but in every one America is commiserated on losing the artist who brought about the architectural uplift of New York City.

The Mills Girls

The Misses Ardella and Bessie Mills are studying vocal music in New York with all the strenuousness characteristic of those clever girls. Bessie has stopped working on her book, "The Primitive Man," and now gives vent to her literary energies in song writing. Her great ambition, I hear, is to write a comic opera.

Nearly All

A friend writes me from Munich that a General in the German army who had met Isadora Duncan in Berlin some weeks later made the acquaintance of Miss Llewelyn Atherton in Munich. "What!" he exclaimed, when he heard where they hailed from, "do all the clever women in America come from San Francisco."

Among the recent arrivals at Byron Hot Springs are Clyde P. McLeod, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Kinkand, W. H. Davenport, Dr. N. S. Chase and wife, Miss Eleanor Davenport and D. Davenport, from San Francisco; Dr. T. A. Williams from Oakland; M. B. Rankin and Miss Rankin, from Portland; Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Wilson, from Berkeley.

Miss Grace Freeman, a pupil of Giulio Minetti, will give three violin recitals during March.

Gossip From Monterey

My Monterey correspondent writes: Dr. and Mrs. Walter Renwick Hughes, who spent a part of their honeymoon in the South, are at Del Monte. Their wedding a fortnight ago was one of the prettiest affairs of the winter. The bride was Miss Lily Hohfield, a graduate of the University of California, and the gold medalist of her class. She afterwards took a post-graduate course at Stanford and received the degree of A. M. Dr. Hughes is a prominent dentist of Alameda, where he has taken a leading part in the affairs of the smart set. The marriage was the culmination of a romantic courtship begun last summer, when both young people were with the Sierra Club in the King's River canyon. When they return to Alameda they will make their home at 2135 Santa Clara avenue. * * * Mr. and Mrs. W. Rafel of Chicago are another young couple who, after spending the first weeks of their married life in the South, are now at Del Monte, where they will remain some time. Both are very fond of horseback riding and are planning a forty-mile ride. One of their jaunts will be to the Rancho Del Monte. * * * Mrs. Peter Musto of Stockton is at Del Monte with her three charming daughters, Miss Elvera, Miss Lenore and Miss Florence. * * * A number of guests from Carmel and from Pacific Grove came over to spend the night of the Assembly Ball. handsome men in full dress uniform. The ball was given under the auspices of the Monterey Civic Club, of which Mrs. David Rodrick is president. The patronesses were Mrs. Marion P. Maus, Mrs. H. Garrard, Mrs. James A. Murray, Mrs. B. V. Sargent Sr., Mrs. David Jacks, Mrs. J. P. Pryor, Mrs. H. B. Chase and Mrs. T. J. Field. James Hopper and Ross Hoffman came over from Carmel for the ball. C. B. Stafford and Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Stevens also spent the night here. * * * Mrs. George Howard of San Mateo came down the early part of the week to see her mother, Mrs. H. Schmeidel. #### The Cadenasso Exhibit

The Cadenasso Exhibit in the gallery of the Hobart Mansion, now used as a furniture annex to the City of Paris, is a most creditable display of paintings in oil. There are about forty pictures in the exhibit. Among them are the "Legend of the Tamal," "End of a Day," "Golden Gate Park," "After the Storm," "Tamalpais at Mid-day," "Haying Time," "A Gray Day" and "Misty Morning." Cadenasso is a child of nature, extremely sensitive to its voices and its forms and quick to catch the spirit of atmosphere. Many of his weird effects are heightened by a cunning diffusion of high lights and clever manipulation of the softer grays that gives to his work the touch of impressionism. This exhibition will continue for two weeks and the public is invited through the courtesy of the City of Paris Dry Goods Company.

Sunday evening, February 24, Part I of Gounod's "Redemption" will be sung at Trinity Church, corner Gough and Bush streets, at 8 o'clock. The soloists are: Mrs. Gish, Miss Arden, Mr. Trowbridge, Mr. Soldwedel, Mr. Saunders and Mr. Glen. Mr. Louis H. Eaton is the organist and director.

Lambardi's in Two Farewell Appearances

The Lambardi Italian Grand Opera Company will give two farewell performances at the Novelty Theatre next Sunday, matinee and night. The singers will appear at the matinee in a great quartette of acts selected from their most prominent successes. The programme on that occasion will include acts from "Chopin," "Rigoletto," "Lucia" and "Favorita." The cast will include all the leading members of the company. The bill for Sunday night will be "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci." The double bill will be sung by Giorgi, Millon, Franceschini, D'Ottavi, Martinez-Patti, Antola, Pacini and Seifoni. The prices are to be 50c, $1.00 and $1.50.

Wilde's Great Tragedy

The Colonial Stock Company has achieved a notable triumph in "Salome," and the management is deserving of the highest credit for the artistry of the production, which makes a very strong appeal to our esthetic sense and considerably enhances the prestige of this stock theatre. There is not a discordant note in the whole performance, and though some of the acting is not above the commonplace, there is some that glows with a white light. Miss Jewell's performance is most felicitous. This actress invests the role of Salome with tillating wit, his mondaine elegance and frivolous conceits. "Salome" is a play no less distinguished for its dramatic than its literary fibre. Wilde handled this slow and simple form of tragedy with the same dexterity with which he handled the quick and complex form of modern comedy. For simplicity of technic there is nothing in the whole range of the drama comparable with it unless we except the works of Sophocles, and yet it holds one in thrall through every line, from the moment of the sounding of the note of terror in the very beginning down to the foreknown catastrophe. In this little play the trick of suspense is raised to the nth degree of perfection, and if it had nothing more to recommend it than this exquisite triumph of technical skill it would deserve to live as an example of the power of one of the chief elements of the dramatic art.

the true spirit of Wilde's wonderful creation and is most successful in the preservation of cadence. Perhaps at times she should arouse herself to more passionate outbursts, but she was by no means lacking in abandon and she is at all times sweetly seductive. Her dance of the seven veils is idealistic and alluring and replete with the suggestion of Oriental imagery that quite transports one out of the prosaic moods. Norval McGregor plays the prophet excellently, but his voice is not sufficiently sonorous for the role. He is, however, a graceful and convincing figure. The Herod of Mr. Rogers is in the main satisfactory. Mr. Pollard is realistic as the young Syrian and his death scene is splendidly dramatic. The atmosphere of the piece is well contrived and after yielding to the emotions sought to be conveyed one cannot but marvel at the wonderful genius of Oscar Wilde, especially if one reflects that this powerful, sombre tragedy was the work of the man who, in "A Woman of No Importance" and other comedies, delights us with his scin-

The Coming San Carlo Company

Grand Opera at the Chutes! Seems odd but the opera will be all right, for it is the San Carlo Company of which Alice Nielsen and Nordica are members and which includes a tenor who is said to be in the Caruso class. Moreover it is an organization as adequately equipped as the Conried road company and with all the essential accessories. There is a chorus of fifty, an orchestra of forty-five, a ballet of twenty-four and a triple cast of principals. Will Greenbaum selected the Chutes Theatre because of its capacity. At any of the down-town houses with their limited capacity it would be necessary to fix the minimum prices at $2 and the maximum at $5. At the Chutes the schedule will range from $1 to $3. Messrs. Harry Bishop and Will Greenbaum, I hear, are to be important factors in both the dramatic and musical field this year.

The Great Rosenthal

Rosenthal, the world's greatest master of piano technic, will appear at Christian Science Hall, corner Scott and Sacramento streets, next Thursday evening and that will be the only evening performance that he will give in this city. The great artist's offerings at this concert will be Beethoven's Sonata "Apassionata," Chopin's Sonata Op. 58, Berceuse, Scherzo in B flat minor, Valse by Chopin (the latter arranged by Rosenthal as a contrapuntal study in thirds) Nocturne by Henselt, "Papillons" and Humoresque and Fugato on themes by Johann Strauss, the latter works being compositions of the artist himself. The second performance will be given Saturday afternoon at 2:30 and the third on Sunday afternoon.

On Friday afternoon, March 1, Rosenthal will have the distinction of being the first soloist engaged by the University of California for the symphony concerts at the Greek Theatre. On this occasion the master will play Chopin's E minor concerto and Liszt's E flat concerto with the accompaniment of the University Orchestra of seventy men. Seats for all of the above are now on sale at both Kohler & Chase's, corner Sutter and Franklin, and Sherman, Clay and Co.'s, on Van Ness avenue above California. Prices, $2.00, $1.50 and $1.00.

At the American

"The Singing Girl," that dainty little opera written for Alice Nielsen and in which she spread her fame as a comic opera prima donna, has proved a source of such delightful entertainment at the American Theatre that it will be continued as the attraction during the coming week. Ada Hemmi has some fine opportunities in this opera and she makes the most of them with her excellent art. But this company abounds in good voices and vocally the performance is superior to that which was given in the original production. As for the comedy business, it is handled by Webb and Kunkel in a way that keeps the audience in a spasm of laughter.

Orpheum Vaudeville

Lee Harrison heads the list of artists who will appear at the Orpheum next week. He will be remembered as the principal comedian of the Rogers Brothers' Company. His specialty consists of smart songs and stories with which he has made a great hit in vaudeville. An engagement of considerable interest is that of the two male stars of the Lambardi Opera Company,

It will be the last week of Chas E. Evans and his capable company in their merry farce, "It's Up to You William."

The Savage Opera Company

There is a treat in store for musical San Francisco. Henry W. Savage is scheduled to open the Van Ness Theatre in March with his English Grand Opera Company in Puccini's beautiful Japanese opera, "Madam Butterfly." This masterpiece by the greatest of modern Italian composers, with its quaint and effective settings and its cast of foreign and native artists, assisted by an orchestra of sixty musicians, will be the most impressive operatic event of the year. The prima donnas, each of whom sings the title role, are women with the European hall-mark. One of them is Florence Easton, who has sung at Covent Garden, London. Madam Elza Szamosy is from the Royal Opera at Budapest. Rena Vivienne, an American artist, has been singing in Milan. Harriet Behnee, a New York girl, has been singing leading contralto roles at the German Opera Comique at Berlin. Miss Estelle Bloomfield, another New York girl, has been singing in Dresden. Miss Ethel Dufre Houston, the contralto, has a large repertoire both in French and in English. The opera of "Madam Butterfly" is in three acts, the libretto being taken from the familiar and fascinating little story by John Luther Long. It scored a remarkable success in Europe and then broke all world's records for grand operas when it was produced in New York. Mr. Savage is sending to this city his complete organization. The opera will be heard at the opening of the new Van Ness Theatre on the evenings of Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, March 11, 12 and 13, and at the Wednesday matinee. Mail orders, accompanied by check, addressed to Gottlob, Marx and Company, both from San Francisco and outside cities, will be filled in the order of their receipt as near as possible to the location desired, on next Monday, February 25. The regular seat sale will commence at Kohler & Chase's music house, Monday, March 4, the prices being $3.00, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 and $1.00.

Creston Clarke Coming

"The Ragged Messenger," with Creston Clarke in the leading role of John Morton, the clergyman, will be the attraction at the Novelty Theatre commencing next Monday. This new play, which is a purely modern emotional drama, has aroused considerable enthusiasm among theatregoers. It is heralded as a play that deals with live, vital questions at issue between the sexes in their relations to each other, and it dares to take an astoundingly new view of an old subject. It does not preach, yet its moral is unmistakable. A splendid company supports Mr. Clarke. There will be matinees Saturday and Sunday.

"The Serenade" at Idora

Next Monday night "The Serenade" will be put on at Idora Park with the full strength of the company. This is an opera in which Ferris Hartman, who is enjoying a new lease of comic life, achieved one of his big successes. Hartman, by the way, is as great a favorite at Idora as he was in apogee of his fame at the Tivoli. On Thursday evening, February 28, there will be a masquerade carnival at the big skating rink in the Park.

Another Volume of Irwin Verse

Wallace Irwin has already voiced his protest against being called every name but his own, so, in deference to his objection, we shall refrain from further comparisons. His knack of ready rhyming and the humorous turn of his fancy have opened the columns of magazines and newspapers to his knock, and there is scarcely a timely topic on which he has not had something to say. The woman's club, the Mission style of furnishing, the automobile, the amateur Socialist, the Monroe doctrine, the immigration problem, spelling reform, the Panama canal, the spiritualist materializings, hero worship, modern education,—nothing escapes him. Ever since the advent of the "Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum" the reading public has been made aware of the catchiness of Mr. Irwin's work. Despite the excellence of his nonsense verse, there is left a certain conviction that he is only playing and that some day he will give us something so unexpectedly good that he will be placed in the front rank of serious poets. The poems included in the last section of his new volume, "What Fools These Mortals Be" have all appeared in the special literary magazines where they have enjoyed the appreciation of the literati. "Random Rhymes and Odd Numbers" is the first collection of Mr. Irwin's fugitives, though it has been preceded by his "Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum," "Omar Khayyam Jr.," "Nautical Lays of a Landsman" and quite recently, "Chinatown Ballads." This new volume is from the Macmillan press, and is quite a sizable one for a book of verse, over three hundred pages, all more or less good, very little indifferent and none bad.

faintly, struggling to free itself from matter and to escape into the sky. But no one marked it much, for tragedies may be enacted at one's elbow, and none the wiser; for indeed, most tragedies seem comic to the looker-on, who does not comprehend the motive, and takes the sufferer for a mere ill-bred person, who might have lived and died, just like the rest of us, had he had common sense.

So the bees hung about the lime trees, making their music in the flowers, the cedars' branches swayed like windmills' sails, and in the thickest of the woods the capercailzie crowed, flapping their wings with a strange hollow sound which echoed through the trees, like negro tomtoms by night up some mosquito-haunted river on the coast, or like the mournful drum which Bernal Diaz heard during the siege of the great temple of Tenochtitlan.

Then, on a morning in late June, when the soft air just curled the rising mist from off the moss into tall pillars such as rise in a simoon, one who had looked by chance at the old needlework in passing saw that the tragedy had taken place.

The temple's veil was rent, and fallen asunder, and underneath the glass a brown and fluffy moth had come into the world, been born, had stirred, just fluttered and had died, seeing the air it could not fly in, feeling the life within it, which fate that laughs at all things, moths and men alike, said it should never taste.

To wish it peace, it who had not known trouble, were in vain, and for repose, its wings had never fluttered in the air. Care, sorrow, love, hate, pain, revenge, and still less avarice, or ambition by which the fool and not the noble fall, it shall know none of, and probably would not have felt in its brief joyous life.

But to be cabined in a cage of glass, to suffer the "peine forte et dure" of death by pressing, for no committed crime, poor, fluttering fairy round the lamp of life, 'twas hard. How brief your pleasures and how innocently, merely to play about the corridors of the old melancholy house to prove your wings, and then to soar into some fir tree on the lawn, equipped at once with all the lore inherited from those your ancestors in Eden, who flitted through the cypresses of that fair garden on the Tigris, and then after a day or two, at most a month, to love, to rove at night amongst the trees, to fall at the first frost or heavy shower, and lie amongst the needles of the pines without a single crime upon your conscience, tender as your wings.

Alas, poor fellow, would-be flutterer in the realms of a hard world, perhaps the fate presiding at your birth who with her unkind shears cut off your destiny, was kind. Who knows? You might have come to ruin or mishap, e'en you who surely had no unkind thought in your minute and microscopic brain.

Circling about at night, thinking no evil, after the fashion of your clan, a candle light which to your complex eyes might have appeared a sun, vast, round and vivifying, might have attracted you and left you writhing agonised and maimed, a prey to children who in their rage for self-improvement, or from the cruelty which we who have no wings bear in our blood as the true sign of the great curse our common Maker set upon us at the Fall, transfixed you with a pin.

Perils we know not of and which have never entered our dull brains, so ill attuned to all the mysteries of your world, may have awaited you. Some pestilence which no physician of our kind has diagnosed might have attacked and struck you blind, crippling your flight or rendering you unsightly to the companions of your merry little world. This might have been, or the fell spider with his web of fated filaments entangled your soft wings and drawn you struggling to his den, cut off your life and fed upon your flesh, for these are dangers even we who know so little of your lives can comprehend. From these your fate has freed you, making you equal to great Caesar, Hannibal, to Alexander, both to the greatest and the least of all mankind, by the mere fact that you have lived.

Rail not at fate, poor iridescent moth, although the hues upon your wings were meant to shine at twilight as you flickered through the trees with just as fair a lustre as the most gorgeous butterfly who hovers in the sun on the Tijuca's slopes can ever boast. Do not repine although no snowflake would have floated from the sky more delicately than the unfollowable pulsations of your wings would have conveyed you through the twilight air in your brief honeymoon with life. You will not know the joy of liberty, tender and innocent in its conception, as moths alone conceive it, out of created things. Let no cursed man of science with his dog Latin and apocalyptic Greek dispel my ignorance, telling me that the family of moths is as rapacious as the vulture or the crow. I'll not believe it, but will mourn thy fate, condemned to see for a brief moment all the beauties of the light, never to flit at evening in the dark recesses of the trees. Poor pilgrim to a world unworthy of your innocence, who lived and died so quickly, surely you solved at once the mysteries which we live for a lifetime and still never grasp. My fellow-sufferer by fate, you, who left instantly the world in which we tarry longer instants, with as scant comprehension of our lives perhaps as you, do not forget us prisoned in our glass; but in the limbo where you flutter now, think that a fellow-moth remembers you, just as you lived and died, with your soft body, iridescent wings, and sharp antennae.

TOILET POWDER.

There is no toilet article in the selection of which greater care should be used than a toilet powder.

In these days of imitation and substitution there is so much of inferior goods on the market that it is necessary to be continually on one's guard. Highly-scented toilet powders are so frequent as to be a continual source of danger. Such inferior products will often do a permanent injury to a delicate skin. It is far wiser never to take chances with an unknown article. Be sure, rather, to insist upon a trade-marked product of recognized merit. With toilet powder, as with most other lines of goods, it is safer to trust an old-established house with years of experience and a reputation for making only the best. Mennen's Toilet Powder is a trade-marked article, which has for years been recognized by physicians as the best preparation made. The absolute purity of its ingredients and the exercise of the greatest care and skill in its manufacture have given the product of the Mennen Co. a quality of uniform excellence. That is why your physician recommends it.

For your protection, Mennen's face (the trade-mark of the Mennen Co.) is on the cover of every box of the genuine.

All first-class dealers carry Mennen's Toilet Powder and will supply it if you insist. It is supplied by the Government for both Army and Navy.

no abatement of courtesy and respect in his manner. There was nothing worse to come. He was making it easy for her.

"It is very little to offer, but it will refresh you, at least," said Elder Beals, returning with a pitcher of water and a plate of crackers and cheese. And, pouring out a glassful and presenting it, "It is very cool and excellent spring-water, I assure you, madam—or it would seem less formal if you would kindly let me know your name."

"You're very kind, thanks," said the woman, taking the proffered glass. "My name is—that is, I'm known as Dolly Jewett."

"Thank you, Miss Jewett; I am pleased to have made your acquaintance. And now, little one, do you wish to sit on my knee? May I inquire your name also?"

The child bent toward Elder Beals's outstretched arms, but didn't answer. So her protectress replied for her:

"Mary."

"Mary? The sweetest of names," commented the minister. "Mary—you said she was not your daughter, Miss Jewett?"

"No, she is Josephine's child—the woman who was killed in the Long Tom saloon."

"Oh, I remember hearing there was a child. And you are the kind lady who adopted her?"

"I thought no one else would care about here, and it was pitiful to think of the little lone thing."

"A truly Christian spirit, Miss Jewett."

"No, it wasn't that; it was just that I couldn't bear to think of her having no mother, or no one to try to fill her mother's place. I meant to be a mother to her."

"And I'm sure you have been, Miss Jewett. Her health and neatness betoken motherly care, and her evident fondness for you could come only from motherly kindness."

"If it was only that, Elder Beals. I would never part with Mary. No one can help loving her. You can't think by how many little endearments she finds her way into your heart. But there is where the trouble lies. The fonder I grow of mothering her the more I feel that I am not fit to be her mother."

The speaker's voice and features betrayed strong emotion. Elder Beals looked thoughtfully at her for a space, then turned his gaze toward the distant prospect.

"The feeling is as fine and true as was the other," he said at last. "But you have something to add, I infer?"

"Yes. The little one has reached an age when she begins to observe. Every innocent look is becoming a reproach to me, and presently every observation will be an evil influence to her. She must go somewhere else."

"I agree with you, Miss Jewett; it is proper she should. Do you know any one—have you thought of any one who would take her?"

"Only of you, Elder Beals. That is why I came."

The minister gave a start that nearly unbalanced little Mary, who had fallen asleep on his knee.

"Me!" he exclaimed; "why, I am the last person you should have thought of."

"There is no one else," insisted Dolly, in a tone of settled conviction. "Just think a moment for yourself. There are no relatives, no friends, no asylums,

This famous Cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the Monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as LIQUEUR PERES CHARTREUX (the Monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well), distilled by the same order of Monks who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years and who alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar.

The only family—the Grimshaws—wouldn't touch her with a pair of tongs on account of her father and mother. To be with any of the other women would be as bad for her as to be with me. There remains only a choice among the men, and that is you. Oh, Elder Beals, I have studied it over and over and over, with only the thought of what was best for Mary, and I have made the only possible choice."

The minister looked very grave. He was weighing Dolly's earnest words, and trying to see if the course they marked out for him was the true line of duty.

"You have stated the case very clearly and very forcibly, Miss Jewett. There isn't a point in your argument that I can question until it comes to the selection of myself as the fittest guardian."

"That is the most indisputable one of all," insisted Dolly.

"Admitting the question of propriety to be settled by circumstances, still I am so little qualified, so unsuited for the trust."

"You will learn all that is necessary very quickly. She isn't much trouble. Indeed she is far more self-helpful than you would suppose from her age."

"But I know nothing at all about the care of children."

"Mrs. Grimshaw could tell you anything you wished to know, or—or, if not, I would be glad to help you in any way I could."

"Thank you very much, Miss Jewett. You persuade me against my own judgment; or, rather, you have shown me my duty more clearly than I could have seen it myself. I will take little Mary, and care for her to the best of my ability."

"Oh, I knew you would! Thank you, sir, thank you very much!"

"What do you call her besides Mary?"

"Cross—her father's name. But I would change that now, if I were you."

"No, she shall keep it; and let us trust she will have to bear no heavier one."

"Shall I leave her here now?"

"It would be as well, and it will save you trouble. You can send her things."

"Yes, I'll send them as soon as I get back to town," said Dolly, rising. "No, don't get up; it is better that I go while she is sleeping. Thank you again, sir, and good-bye."

"Good-bye, Miss Jewett. I shall always remember you as Mary's rightful mother."

Dolly bowed in acknowledgment of the kind tone and words, and, turning, went swiftly down the trail. Elder Beals followed her absently with his eyes for a little while; then he looked down at the sweet face of the sleeping child; then at the town and the river and the distance, till the outward vision changed to an inner one in which he saw his whole life transformed by the little stranger who had so unexpectedly come into it, and caught glimpses of a far-off time when an ardent first love had inspired him with illusive dreams of a better lot and happier fatherhood.

Fortunately Mary was still at the age when novelty has a greater charm than recollection. It was the era of discovery with her—that marvel-period in all children's lives when within their little spheres more wonders are revealed to them than older explorers will ever find in unknown seas and continents. And she was at the age, too, of universal paternal adoption, when every man is a papa. So, what with the trees and squirrels and birds in the open and the surprising revelations within the cabin—every fresh discovery being heralded by "Look! papa, look!"—she had little time to realize the change in her surroundings or to miss her foster-mother.

When Elder Beals had improvised a cot and was putting her to bed, there was a querulous little wail for her mama; but he quieted it by a dimly remembered lullaby, and before the sense of loneliness could come again she was asleep. That was Mary's last reaching-out to the past. Before the succeeding day's long, long series of wonderful discoveries was over, the old order of things had receded to an infinite distance and the new one was as if it had always been.

But Elder Beals could not adjust himself to the altered conditions as quickly. At first the child's incessant activity and prattle, disturbing as they did the accustomed quiet of his life, annoyed him; but that sensation soon changed to one of fondness for her ways, and in a little while he grew to be as playful and noisy as she.

The management of her person and dress was a more difficult thing to overcome. It was like learning a new science. But by earnest effort he at length became as expert as any hair-dresser or tire-woman, and the little one was always the pink of neatness.

Then the most serious problem of all presented itself—what was to be done with Mary when he went forth on his preaching missions? The question was a matter of much study, but at last an inspired idea flashed upon him. He had seen the squaws packing their papooses, strapped to a frame, upon their backs. Mary was too big to be lashed up like that, but what was the matter with putting her into a basket and carrying her like a papoose?

In accordance with this inspiration Elder Beals procured a large Indian basket, padded and gaily decorated it, and then rigged straps to fasten over his shoulders, so that he could carry it on his back like a knapsack. The delight of little Mary over this new conveyance exceeded all the other joys of her life. No princess in the most splendid of howdahs was ever as proud as she when first seated in her wicker car and mounted on Elder Beals's back.

The first appearance of the clergyman with this happy contrivance on the streets of Pickeye provoked symptoms of levity; but when the seriousness of the preacher and the happiness of the child were noted, the mirth was suppressed, and people vied with each other in testifying their respect and approval.

It was the same in all the camps. If Elder Beals had been welcome before, he was doubly welcome now with his fairy burden, which the rudest miner felt to be a self-imposed and sacred charge. The offerings, which had been meagre enough to the poor itinerant preacher himself, poured in upon little Mary. Every imaginable curiosity and trinket was stored up for her coming, so that she nearly always returned home wedged tight in her tiny car with presents. And not merely unconsidered trifles to please her. There was many and many a goodly nugget among the contributions. The preacher's cabin was not only fast becoming a curiosity-shop but a treasure-house as well.

Thus things went on for a whole happy summer and autumn. Elder Beals and Mary constantly becoming more endeared to each other and more popular with the miners. But a sad ending—one that should cast a gloom over every camp and cabin—was at hand.

The Indians had been evincing an ugly disposition for some months, committing many depredations, and of late they had shown themselves decidedly hostile. Most of the tribe had retired to the mountain fastnesses, which was considered a bad sign. The few who still prowled about the settlements were thought to be spies.

The alarm occasioned by this state of affairs had led to the organization of a military force in nearly every camp, and to the withdrawal to more central points of those living in remote or exposed places. Pickeye had drawn itself into its shell like a snail, its outskirts being practically deserted.

But Elder Beals had persistently refused to abandon his cabin, though it was the most exposed of all, being away up in the edge of the woods a full half mile from the center of the town. He said he didn't apprehend any trouble, and that, even should there be, he had always been very friendly with the Indians and they wouldn't molest him.

So the weeks went along, until one dark night in November the inhabitants of Pickeye were startled by the sound of Elder Beals's horn. It was a call such as they had never heard before. The blasts at first rang high and clear, as if to sound an alarm; then came an appealing note, as if for help; and finally the summons died away in a long wailing, despairing strain. It was such a call as Roland must have sounded on his horn at Roncevalles.

At the first note the men of Pickeye had seized their arms and gone rushing up the hill; but they were too late. When they reached the minister's cabin everything was quiet, except a little sobbing cry out of the darkness within. A bonfire was speedily made that lighted up the whole scene, and then the sad sight stood revealed.

Across the threshold lay Elder Beals, his head split open by an axe or tomahawk. In his right hand was still grasped his tin horn, battered and blood-stained, as if he had used it for a weapon, and in his left was tightly clutched a mass of coarse black hair. The wicker basket was strapped upon his back, he evidently having intended to escape with Mary. It was a sorry spectacle, but it told a heroic story—the lofty purpose to save his little charge if he saved himself, and the noble fact of his bravely battling and dying in her defense.

Mary was found safe and unharmed, though much frightened, in her little crib. The alarm sounded by Elder Beals on his tin horn and the responsive shouts of the men as they rushed to the rescue, together with the preacher's stout defense, must have caused the savages to retreat without looking for her, even if they were aware of her presence. She told all she knew about the affair. There had been at first some soft taps on the door, and then, when her papa wouldn't open it, a great pounding. Then her papa went to the window and blew his horn until the door was broken in, when there was a great struggle for a little while, and then everything was still. She hadn't made any noise all the while till then, for she knew her papa wouldn't let anyone hurt her, but when it became quiet and her papa wouldn't answer her, she grew afraid and cried.

They did not let her know that Elder Beals was dead, but, after his body had been borne away, they told her it would be better for her to go with them to town, where her papa had gone, for the bad men might come again. So she dried her eyes and snuggled closely to the breast of Arkansaw, who took her in his arms, only too glad to follow her papa.

The funeral of Elder Beals was the most touching event in the annals of Pickeye, for an intensely emotional populace showed its deepest respect, and expended its tenderest sympathies on that occasion. It was felt that his had been the solitary influence for good in all the turmoil of their wild life. His forbearance, his gentleness, his patience, his unwearying endeavor to inspire them with higher ideals, were now discussed and seen in their true light for the first time. But a practical bent directed their memories rather to his temporal than to his spiritual doings. His loyal fatherhood and self-sacrificing devotion to little Mary brought a lump into even the roughest throat whenever that episode was recalled. And, above all, it was conceded that the faithful alarum from his tin horn and his heroic defense had saved the town from surprise and possible massacre.

Not only was every place of business in Pickeye closed that day—even the Long Tom and other saloons—but there was no clang of pick or shovel in any of the surrounding camps. The hush that fell upon the scene is comparable to nothing but the silence that crept over the awed world at the death of Pan. There seemed to be only one surviving purpose in all of the communities—that of showing their love and reverence for Elder Beals. So the streets of Pickeye were crowded as never before. But there was no hilarity. The very resorts of frolic were themselves draped in mourning.

In view of the immensity of the gathering it was decided to hold the services at the grave, as no building in town could accommodate the concourse. Accordingly the procession formed and moved silently toward the graveyard, it being thought best to dispense with the brass band, as the occasion was neither a festive nor triumphal one.

At the head of the cortege were six strong men, bearing the remains. The plain coffin was draped with a flag, on which were placed a wreath of late wildflowers and the dead preacher's battered tin horn. Immediately behind the pallbearers walked Dobie Joe, carrying little Mary on his back in her wicker basket, as Elder Beals had carried her. But there was no gladness in the child's face now, though she knew that Dobie Joe was going to be a new papa to her. The disconsolate little one only looked fixedly through her tears down at the big box that contained the dear papa who was gone. Mrs. Grimshaw and her daughter Cosy were next to the chief mourner, and after them came a line of townsmen and miners that appeared interminable, sad, silent and bareheaded; and at the very end of the procession walked Dolly Jewett, perhaps the most sorrowful and reverent of all.

General Houston had been selected to read the burial service and pronounce an eulogy. Of all the surprising transformations of that day the change in him was perhaps the most marked. His reading of the service was a revelation of repressed but moving elocution, while his subdued tone and manner during the delivery of the eulogium gave no intimation of the furious orator that he was. It seemed as if the memory of Elder Beals's gentle spirit had chastened every one.

"In different human beings are many different desires," said General Houston, "but there is one that is common to all mankind—the wish to be kindly remembered after we are gone. It is born of the soul's instinctive craving for affection and horror of oblivion. Some have sought to gain the coveted end by living a blameless and beneficent life, some by courting a glorious and heroic death; but it has seldom happened that any one has been so fortunate as to attain to both of these prerequisites. The beloved friend whose ashes we are about to commit to earth was one of the favored few. His life was so beautiful, so useful, so self-denying and given up to others, that it alone would have caused us to cherish and venerate his memory; but the heroism of his death has kindled our veneration into a fervor that never could have been inspired by any course of living, however exemplary. Men have been made saints and demigods for doing less than Elder Beals has done. But he desired neither beatification nor glory. He found the only reward he wished in the consciousness of having done his duty; and if his gentle spirit be looking down upon us now, it feels more joy at this simple tribute of his humble neighbors than it would in a canonization or an apotheosis. For one who did so much with so little flourish no testimonial could be so befitting as an imitation of his own candor and simplicity. So, let us consign his dust to earth tenderly as he would have buried ours, saying only: Beloved comrade, true friend, hail and farewell!"

The threnody recited by C. Augustus Dinkey, the young Foothill Bard, was not up to his usual high-water mark, but this was overlooked in view of the deep emotion under which he evidently was laboring.

ELDER BEALS

The heart with woe for words too deep
In silent tears its grief reveals,
And we should only stand and weep
Beside the grave of Elder Beals.

What words can speak our grief, or tell
How gentle, kind and true he's been,
Or how so great a soul could dwell
In one of such a humble mien?

We hark for his tin horn in vain:
Ah, we would rather hear it going
Than listen to earth's sweetest strain
Or hear the horns of Elfland blowing!

We have his homely basket still:
Madonnas would seem ordinary
If someone with a Raphael's skill
Had painted him and little Mary!

But it requires no words of mine
To paint his virtues or upbuild them,
Those virtues were so bright and fine
That there is nothing which can gild them.

So lay him gently in these sands,
'Neath purple heath and golden-rods,
The last poor service of our hands,
And trustfully leave him in God's.

With the simple words of the poet yet floating in the air like an invocation, the coffin, with the battered tin horn still resting upon it, was lowered into the grave, and while a thousand heads bowed sorrowfully and reverently the earth was heaped over all that was mortal of the beloved little minister.

But his lowly resting-place was not to be forgotten or neglected. Before Spring came to spread her bloom and greenery over it, a monument, purchased by general subscription, had been erected on the hallowed spot, bearing this inscription:

ELDER BEALS.

Killed by Indians, November 17, 1852, while defending his home and the settlement.

He was brave, gentle and true.

"Others he saved, himself he could not save."

A Tragedy in Journalism

Once more has that familiar tragedy been enacted—the failure of a worthy ambition. With a Jovian front and a Wagnerian overture of crashing brasses the Ridgway Weekly thundered into the world to revolutionize things journalistic. It has stolen unboisterously out to the accompaniment of a funeral dirge on a soft pedal. The militant weekly for God and country is now a defunct weekly for no reason in particular unless it be that its expenses exceeded its income, a distressing thing predicted by many sane journalists after they had inspected the first number. The untoward adventure cost considerably more than a quarter of a million dollars, but the experience may be worth the price. Mr. Erman J. Ridgway of Everybody's Magazine, to whom belongs the distinction of having conceived the idea of imparting thirteen different shades of color to one magazine, tells us in his valedictory that he is defeated but not crushed. He assumes the jaunty air of one upon whom fortune has cast so mild a frown that it has occasioned him not the slightest anxiety. We suspect Mr. Ridgway of posing. But this is a diversion that he should not be begrudged. It would be cruel to deny him the gratification to be derived from such innocent, harmless dissembling as may contribute to his reputation as a good loser. Far be it from us to envy Mr. Ridgway the pleasure of making the best of a temporary embarrassment. And if we do not offer him condolences it is because we know he is still a successful journalist and is not looking for sympathy. But the Ridgway valedictory impels us to reflect on the Ridgway personality which Mr. Ridgway reveals to us for the first time and which has all the merit of the unexpected. He tells us that he is a "purposeful man" whose "faith in the ideas" for which he made his fight and "belief in the fundamental principles" stood out so clear and strong that he knew they had "the divine spark of immortality." He started his weekly not because he wanted to but because he had to. The ideas dominated him and compelled him to lift his voice in the wilderness. One of these ideas was, he tells us, that the local weeklies in the several cities were of an inferior quality. But the paramount idea was the idea of a crusade "not for profit but for the common good." He intended to be found fighting "wherever the strong are opposing the weak, wherever the thoughtless are grinding the helpless, wherever selfishness seeks that which is not its own, wherever power strikes ruthlessly, wherever money flaunts defiantly, wherever wrong seeks to triumph and wherever wrong cries out for a champion." Obviously Mr. Ridgway is in the nature of a reincarnation of our valorous friend Don Quixote de la Mancha, for that distinguished knight was inspired with similar laudable conceits. What that great hero undertook to achieve with his sword, Mr. Ridgway started out to accomplish with an intrepid weekly paper. There was no benefit to be procured for mankind that Don Quixote did not conceive it to be his mission to win by the strength of arms and the hazard of his life, but he was not more chivalrous than the founder of the lamented militant weekly. And as Don Quixote was not discouraged after repeated disasters neither is Mr. Ridgway faint hearted after the rebuff which he has suffered. From what he says it is to be inferred that he may be expected to mount his Rozinante again and take once more to the inviting field of adventure. But as he is a shrewd business man he should profit from his experience. Don Quixote was not able to differentiate wineskins from giants after his sad experience with the windmills, but it is to be hoped that henceforth Mr. Ridgway will suffer from no misapprehension; that the money from which he has been separated will prove of educational value. While we have no faith in the multiple weekly scheme we see nothing essentially fatal in the Ridgway fundamentals so far as inspiration for a militant weekly for God and country is concerned. With proper nourishment the divine spark of immortality should wax and never wane. But it is doubtful whether an hebdomadal yellow journal would flourish without an infusion of large ideas and renewed draughts of inspiration such as are accessible in so broad a field as that which Mr. Ridgway sought to cover. With innumerable big dailies screeching in headlines as long as your arm three hundred and sixty-five days in the year it is no small achievement to command attention with a long primer howl pitched to the same key and uttered only once a week.

"When the tired glutton labors through a treat
He finds no relish in the sweetest meat."

Even the humble boarding-house guest revolts at hash three times a day. The weekly newspaper reader is a fastidious individual. He expects a change of fare. Mr. Ridgway gave him the yellow journal in magazine form; a deception not more subtle than Belgian hare disguised as frogs' legs. But we do confess, despite an instinctive resentment of the assumption that there are local weeklies inferior to Ridgway's, that we experienced a pang at the thought that so noble an ambition as Mr. Ridgway's was humbled by the ingratitude of the objects of his chivalry. We hope that into his possession will fall Mambrino's enchanted helmet, and that inspired with fresh resolution of national exaltation and armed for virtue he will resume the task of branding the bold front of shameless men. Indeed we are animated by something more than hope, by something akin to conviction that Mr. Ridgway will not be discouraged by overwhelming indifference. And therefore we offer him the suggestion that upon resuming publication it will be well to reflect that it bores a man to be talked at through a speaking trumpet. Remember the dailies, is our advice to Mr. Ridgway, and keep them like Satan in the background. They can't be improved upon once a week. It does not pay to become the weekly purveyor of the kind of sensationalism that has become trite from constant repetition. Muckraking has been overdone, and when people want to know what is going on in that industry they read the monthly magazines with the probable stupidity of which they are willing to take a chance being assured that there will at least be some pictures worth looking at. People read the weeklies that are distinctive, either to be soothed or to get a new viewpoint, not because they crave the thrill that is superinduced by elaborate emphasis on the commonplace. Making a specialty of attacking the predatory rich in a weekly is like starting a campaign against the climate or organizing an Independence Theatre Society to exploit a batrachian chorus. To make sensationalism go in a weekly one would have to strike a new keynote four times a month. This Mr. Ridgway failed to do and we can account for the failure only upon the supposition that he was preoccupied with Everybody's Magazine, which is one of the best of the monthly journals and which owes its success to his genius. We regret the failure of Ridgway's because it stood for a righteous cause and was devoted to the welfare of the nation.

Mending the Government

Mr. Brisbane, the smart young philosopher of the Hearst Syndicate, is again advocating the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. He tells us that the theory of the men who framed our Constitution that Senators chosen by the State Legislatures would be wiser and better than if they were elected directly by the people has been proved erroneous by experience. Too many of our Senators owe their election to money and corporate influence: therefore we should change our system of government. We have been told that government is an art above the attainment of ordinary genius, but we know that it is easily accessible to the genius of Mr. Brisbane. This young man has an eye trained for the discernment of defects in government and a talent for mending. If given a free hand he would set all things right, put an end to all abuses, supply a remedy for every wrong and accelerate the coming of the Millennium. But as he has not been authorized to take hold of things he utters himself merely as one who is taking but a superficial interest, and not as one charged with the responsibility of guiding the Ship of State. In these purely academic discussions he does not mind clouding issues with false hypotheses and misleading arguments. So it should not be inferred that he is under the delusion that the framers of our Constitution provided for the election of Senators by the State Legislatures solely with a view to getting wiser and better men than it would be likely for us to get by direct vote of the people. He knows that other and equally important considerations moved the framers of the Constitution, one of them being the division of the legislative power; another, the safeguarding of that power from the influence of public clamor. This latter consideration, the framers of the Constitution were ever mindful of, a fact that is signally vindicated in the novel and striking jurisdiction with which the Supreme Court is vested. The jurisdiction of that Court is something unprecedented in the history of government. In that tribunal the rights of the people find their last and best security. It is an institution above all popular assembly, furthest of all other institutions beyond the popular reach, entirely independent of public feeling and invulnerable to the attacks of majorities. Like the Senate it has its origin in the sovereignty of the people, but it goes further than the Senate in bulwarking the people against their own unadvised action, their own uninstructed will. The framers of the Constitution did not worship the people. They knew something of the history of the machinations of demagogues, and while they were willing to have this a government of and by the people, they were sensible of the importance of saving the people not only from their enemies but from themselves. So they gave us a Constitution that conforms to sound principles and finds support in reason and the deductions of experience. They were as conscious as Mr. Brisbane certainly is that injustice will follow the preponderance of one class over another, and though the plutocracy has had considerable influence in our government of late it is by no means certain that conditions are to be improved by the tyranny of the mob. The object of the framers of the Constitution was to perpetuate the sovereignty of the people, and to that end they took from the people certain powers which they deemed it dangerous for the people to retain. We believe their wisdom has long been manifest. They guarded against everything including corruption, but they could not guaranty a perfect system of government, one in which Utopian ideals would be realized. And though they did not anticipate the pernicious activity of the predatory plutocracy the probability is that even had they possessed the gift of prescience they would not have changed the legislative system. To them it would seem, perhaps, as it does to us, that morality must operate to some extent in the affairs of government, and that the ends of government are to be compassed by the cultivation of a healthy public conscience more easily than by ingenious devices wherewith to constrain people to righteous conduct. Rather than abandon the fundamental principles of the science of government to abate an evil we should have recourse to the instruments provided by a government regularly and wisely constituted.

A Greater Navy

In time we shall probably learn that the controversy over the Oriental school was not fruitless. It occurred at a time when the President was very anxious for the success of his plans respecting the enlargement of our navy, and it served his purpose admirably of impressing the country with the importance of being prepared for war. Many Congressmen were more eager to obtain appropriations for their respective districts than to appropriate money for the building of war ships, and it was necessary to get up a war scare in order to bring them to a realization of their paramount duty to the nation. So now we are in a fair way to get a greater navy and to keep pace with England and Japan in the building of big ships, the prototype of which—the Dreadnought—like the Monitor of old, has furnished the language with a new common noun. President Roosevelt is an ardent champion of the Dreadnought. His theory is that one battleship carrying ten large calibre, high power guns is better than five battleships carrying among them the same number of the same guns. His argument is that these ten guns concentrated on one vessel will prevail over ten guns of similar quality distributed among five smaller vessels. To this postulate some naval experts demur. They suggest that there may be too many eggs in one basket and that whereas a 12-inch shell if properly delivered from a big battleship may sink a smaller battleship, the same 12-inch shell launched from one of the smaller ships may sink the big one quite as probably. Captain Mahan is one of the most eminent of the experts that are prejudiced against the dreadnought type, and he is recognized the world over as one of the greatest living authorities on matters pertaining to naval warfare. Notwithstanding the views of Captain Mahan, President Roosevelt and his advisers are persuaded that the big battleship is the ship of the future, and they point to the significant circumstance that the pioneers in the construction of dreadnoughts are England and Japan; the one the victor of Tsushima and the other her ally in whom she has undoubtedly confided. Captain Mahan contends that since the creation of the modern battleship there has been no single instance of a conflict which furnished any satisfactory basis for an enlightened conclusion. On no occasion have two hostile fleets at all equal in armament, personnel and general equipment come into collision and fought out to the point of illustration. Tsushima to the contrary notwithstanding Captain Mahan insists that England and Japan are fighting out the battles of the future on paper by the aid of higher mathematics. But oned as the battle at Tsushima was, Japanese and British experts in possession of all the details, about which they are very reticent, are convinced that the most desirable ship is the one that carries as many 12-inch guns as possible and is capable of delivering the heaviest broadside fire.

State Capital Agitation

Considering the frequency of similar attempts in the past and their invariable result, the agitation to remove the capital from Sacramento and fix it within sight of the Golden Gate in cultured Berkeley is exciting a wonderful amount of interest throughout the state. The campaign planned by the wise politicians across the bay differs widely from that in which San Jose and other ambitious towns went down to defeat. In the first place it was worked out in secret before the general public was let into the project, thereby lending it, when finally announced, a good deal the air of a spontaneous movement. Another unusual feature is the careful reticence of the Berkeley boomers on all points connected with the unsuitability of Sacramento as a state center. The plan is to advance the cause of Berkeley without disparaging the present capital and that it is an eminently judicious method of proceeding is proved by the easy nonchalance with which Sacramentans and Sacramento newspapers treat the whole matter—a condition which would not exist if there were any violent attack on the qualifications of the river city to retain the legislature and the state offices. At this writing the prospect of a victory for the Berkeleyans in the legislature seems exceedingly rosy, the solons of both houses of our impressive law-making body showing every disposition to favor the movement coastward. Some of them are tired of Sacramento, having exhausted its joys and fascinations many sessions since and looking with approbation on the opportunity of getting closer to the metropolis during the sixty fat days of legislating. Others withdrew all strenuous opposition as soon as they ascertained that the contemplated site is outside the mile limit that marks the difference between legal and illegal potatoes in the university town.

Where Los Angeles Comes In

But back of these reasons and others less frivolous lurks a consideration which gives comfort to the Berkeleyans and seems destined to have a mighty influence on the result. That is, the increasing determination of the southern counties of this state to secede from California and to organize a separate state of their own. Influenced largely by Los Angeles this idea has spread rapidly until now it is firmly rooted and cannot much longer be ignored. Los Angeles and the south are willing to help San Francisco and Alameda counties to move the state capital, first, because the increasing conviction that they are soon to have a capital of their own makes them indifferent in the matter and second, because in return for their support they will expect aid of a substantial kind when their pet project is broached. Sentiment in the north on the subject of dividing California into two states is practically nonexistent for the simple reason that the question is not yet regarded as a living one, but if San Francisco is to enter actively into Berkeley's fight for the state capital it behooves her to appreciate rightly the terms on which she may enlist the support of Los Angeles and the rest of the South. State division is a measure sure to excite violent conflict of opinion from its very first agitation; it is also a measure involving many serious problems that cannot be solved while the insistent college townsmen are putting legislative bombs under the capitol building to blow it to tidewater. But when the support of the southrons is extended to this attempt, let it be understood that they have not suddenly realized how much it would mean for San Francisco and have never dreamed that the integrity of the state is imperiled, but to a great body of citizens in the country below Tehachapi no sentimental attachment will prevent a stubborn canvass of the scheme, none existing strong enough to outweigh practical considerations.

Old Age.

By Helen Huntington.

I have finished the rose-days of love,
And the white days of youth.
I have come, by the road of Desire,
To the grey land of Truth.

In the shadow of sleep,
And I murmur of love—"Did I blush?"
And of pain—"Did I weep?"

Perspective Impressions

Let us first ascertain if Grove Johnson and the capitol are inseparable.

San Jose wants the capitol. But San Jose already has the Hayes brothers, and Charley Shortridge and the prune belt. It's vulgar to be hoggish.

The Fifty-ninth Congress is going to adjourn on March 4th and up to date only six amendments to the Constitution have been proposed. And yet this is said to be a progressive country.

The New Theology Union of London has organized a League for the Encouragement of Progressive Religious Thought. Does it need encouragement? Or is the thought of the higher critics retrogressive?

Editor Isfoney of the Daily Nippon is urging the Japanese Chamber of Commerce to give Mayor Schmitz a reception on his return. It cannot be truthfully said that the Japanese are entirely ungrateful.

Gribble on Longfellow.

By Theodore Bonnet

The hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Longfellow has inspired the pen of a Mr. Francis Gribble, and in Putnam's Magazine this learned critic instructs us on the subject of the poet's limitations. Mr. Gribble apprehends that we have not an accurate conception of the standing of Longfellow among the world's bards and he is evidently very sorry for the benighted admirers of the author of Hiawatha who betray their illiteracy and simple-mindedness by their enthusiasm. It pains him to think that educated persons should waste time on so feeble a versifier. Longfellow, he tells us, belongs to the nursery and should be admired only as one admires a pretty child. While it is generally understood that Longfellow fell short of what is called genius, his shortcomings have not been attributed to the cause to which they have been traced by Mr. Gribble. This magazine critic informs us that Longfellow's weakness was religion; he was too pious, spent too much time in church, wrote sermons in verse, and is distinctly the poet of the obvious and the humdrum. One wonders how much of this sort of stuff a man can write without becoming conscious of the fact that he is scribbling or gribbling priggish nonsense. Mr. Gribble writes like one of the higher critics of literature who believe with Verlaine that there must always be enigma in poetry. To these critics the obvious is unpardonable. Their enthusiasm is to be evoked only by those poets that keep safely beyond the verge of the empire of unutterable common sense. It is their proud boast that they belong to the aristocracy of literature which disdains contact with the bourgeoisie. They even pick flaws in Wordsworth who, like Longfellow, is at times a mere declaimer on moral and social topics and who preached the religion of nature. These critics have a very narrow horizon. They can see beauty only when it is presented in the vague and unsubstantial images fashioned by the decadents whose abnormality of vision is their chief charm. They are the bigots of literature. It is not to be denied that among these so-called decadents much fine literature has been produced, but it is not so fine as to justify us in dumping all other kinds of literature into the ocean. Yet that appears to be the consummation devoutly wished by certain critics who have become impatient of the popular ignorance that is moved by simplicity in verse. Not content to revel in their own esthetic delights, which are beyond the intellectual reach of the common herd, they seek to cover with shame and reduce to humiliation all that prefer the less complex appeals to human emotions. This is the attitude of the intellectual snob and in the case of these ultra refined critics it is entirely without justification. For after all the essence of art is its universality, and when it partakes of the nature of an inscrutable mysticism it abandons the object of its existence. It is a familiar proverb that there is no disputing about taste, every man's taste being to himself an ultimate standard without appeal. But we have a sense of conviction of a common nature in our species and this common nature has long been a model or standard for each individual. It is no credit to a man to deviate from the common nature of the species. A man that prefers the odor of onions to the fragrance of violets can find in that circumstance no reason for self felicitation. On the contrary he may justly regard himself as a freak; and we do not admire freaks. Every radical deviation from the standard of taste creates an impression of imperfection, and this standard which is used for enabling us to discriminate in the fine arts has its seat in the universality of our nature. Applying that standard to the works of Verlaine and the other super-sensitive artists who can hear the sweet cry of the stirring grass and who love to see the moon live and die in a copper sky, we find that they are somewhat abnormal. It is not singular that they should abominate a Longfellow, but obviously they are not qualified to pass judgment on the merits of that poet if they can see no poetry in verse that does not present an enigma. And that is the gospel of the school of critics in which Longfellow is abominated. That gospel is fully as ridiculous as that other gospel which asserts that nothing is good poetry which cannot be translated into good prose. The Gribbles exalt obscurity to a dogma, holding that they need not be understood by the vulgar masses so long as they excite the feelings of the best educated people. Verlaine in his Art Poétique informs us that there is nothing more precious than the grey song where the indistinct and the distinct are joined, and according to a French critic who detests the obvious, the charm of verse consists in guessing its meaning; there should always be a riddle in poetry. He tells us that to name an object is to suppress three-quarters of the poet's pleasure which comes from the happiness of divining little by little: to suggest it is the ideal. We should have no quarrel with these exquisites of literature who express themselves in inverted phrases. Let them enjoy themselves designing metrical puzzles to fillip the mentality of the illuminati. There is much that is intelligible in their art despite its recondite symbolism; there is fancy and fluency of thought, there is music in their words; in short, the output of their genius is genuine poetry. But it is not the poetry of Tennyson or of Keats or of Wordsworth or of Longfellow, in which music and meaning usually flow together. In other words it is

The Doctor's Dilemma.

By Dr. Albert Abrams.

That rabid paradoxist, vegetarian, anti-vaccinationist and anti everything else Bernard Shaw, has written a play entitled as above. The poet Shelley was a dietetic revolutionist, and with the same method of reasoning wanted us to become vegetarians and marry our sisters. The dramatist who seeks inspiration from vegetable food selects the worst-natured muse. Doctors have been travestied by Moliere, the prince of comic dramatists, but Jean Baptiste's caricatures were logical and directed against abuses which really existed. A paradedgin of the average physician in Moliere's time is evident in the "Malade Imaginaire," when Beralde says to Argan, the imaginary invalid: You have but to speak with a gown and cap and any gibberish becomes learning, and any nonsense sense. Remember that Moliere painted the physician of the XVII century, who charmed ache with air and agony with words. Shaw, on the contrary, makes an enervated and futile effort to burlesque a scientific twentieth century physician and heaps ridicule on a medical discovery the import of which is almost unbelievable but of the latter more anon. The plot of Shaw's play concerns a pathologist who has discovered a vaccine for tuberculosis which if used with special regard to the opsonic index, will cure the disease. He has only enough vaccine for ten patients for the treatment is still in the experimental stage. There is a lady in the plot and of course a beautiful and rich one, who is married to Dubedat an artist. She does not know however that Dubedat, although a man of genius, is an arrant rascal, for she adores him as a man and worships him as an artist. Dubedat is dying of tuberculosis and she makes a frantic appeal to the pathologist to save her husband. The pathologist knowing the true nature of the rascally Dubedat, is in doubt whether he should save him or permit him to die before his wife's illusions are destroyed. During this state of doubt a fellow-practitioner, a good man although one of no special distinction comes to him to be cured of tuberculosis. To further complicate the plot, the pathologist finds that he has fallen in love with Mrs. Dubedat and secretly entertains the hope of marrying her in the event of the artist's death. With the object of consummating his ambition he salves his dilemma by curing his fellow-practitioner with his limited stock of vaccine and transferring Dubedat to a fashionable and bungling physician. Dubedat of course dies but prior to his demise he exacts from his wife a promise that she will marry at once, inasmuch as widows have always shocked his esthetic sense. The psychologic moment having arrived, the pathologist requests the widow to marry him, confessing at the same time that when he entrusted the artist to the fashionable physician, it was in expectation of an early demise and he proclaims himself a murderer. The lady expresses surprise that so senile a specimen as the pathologist should have dreamed that she would marry him but to dispel all possibility in that direction, she announces that she has already remarried. In this play which is only conspicuous by its puerility, one of the latest medical discoveries, the opsonic index, is immured in senseless verbiage. To present this notable discovery in a delectable form for assimilation by the lay mind is a difficult matter but I will try. The name of Wright is associated with the opsonic index and his achievements are destined to rank with the discovery of vaccination by Jenner. The discovery of Edward Jenner was a matter of observation, the discovery of Wright, a matter of observation plus unremitting scientific investigations. Jenner, the English surgeon of the eighteenth century, first introduced the practice of vaccination as a protective measure against smallpox. Let us for a moment contrast the period before and the period after the introduction of vaccination. In the period before, smallpox was a permanent disease and in epidemic years (in every three to five years) one-half of all mortality was caused by the disease and in non-epidemic years, one-tenth of all mortality. At that time very few escaped smallpox and many of those who escaped death were maimed by loss of sight. The contrasting picture may be epitomized in a simple sentence: "Whenever vaccination and revaccination are maintained, mortality from smallpox is at an end." The human body contains the most deadly poisons made innocuous by the resistance to them of our healthy tissues. We have phosphorus in the blood and bones, hydrochloric acid in the stomach, potassium sulpho-cyanide in the saliva and even arsenic is found as a normal ingredient. The saliva of some men is nearly as poisonous as the venom of a serpent. Why do some contract and others escape infection? For the evident reason that in our blood "antiseptics" have been discovered which protect the organism against infection and, if the action of such antiseptics is but feebly expressed, infection occurs. Among these antiseptics are substances known as opsonins. In my last letter I spoke of Metchnikoff's theory of phagocytosis and told how the living cells ate the invading army of germs and destroyed them. These cells however could not eat the germs if it were not for the presence of opsonins. Now it is possible to determine the opsonic power of a given specimen of blood taken from a patient by considering three things: First. The white blood corpuscles, which may be compared to animals we are about to feed; second, some bacteria which is the food; third, the blood containing the opsonins, which as its name implies is compared to a sauce which makes the food (germs) palatable. The physician now mixed a definite quantity of the corpuscles, germs and blood (serum) and then under the microscope notes the

THE CROWNING ANNAL OF PICKEYE

The Long Tom saloon was in its glory the evening of Saturday, December 19, 1852. Cap Ryan and two assistants were ajump behind the bar, men jostled each other for a chance at the faro table (there was only one now, presided over by a new-comer, Doc Greer), and the air was vibrant with the hum of conversation and the strains of a couple of violins and a clarinet.

"Hello, Dobie Joe," exclaimed Pap Grimshaw, slapping the big miner on the back, "I haven't seen you in a dog's age. Will you join me?"

"I'd join the church for a square drink," said Dobie, leaning an elbow on the bar. "Glad to see you, Pap. How's the wife and Cosey?"

"Right smart, thank you."

"That daughter of yours is the cleanest-chawed rosin ever fashioned in feminine shape," went on Dobie, in a tone of admiration and respect. "A girl who can ride like a vaquero, shoot like a backwoodsman, swim like an otter, and yet be modest and gentle as a kid, is the richest specimen that will ever come out of these diggings."

"I think myself that she's a pretty good girl," assented the flattered parent.

"Good isn't the word," protested Dobie; "she's perfect, divine. We're all in love with her. That's why we call you 'Pap.' Everybody wants to be your son-in-law. I've no chance in the lottery, but I'd give a mountain of gold, if I had it, to have the winning one."

"I thought you were gone on Widow Allison," said Pap Grimshaw.

"So I am. My affection is versatile, universal, and she's the only star on the horizon besides Cosey," explained Dobie Joe unblushingly. But he evidently was glad of the interruption caused by the entrance of the express-rider, for he turned quickly and exclaimed: "Hello, here's Brackett with the letter-express!"

Cap Ryan opened the bag which the messenger had thrown on the counter, took out the letters and called off the names. There were only the ordinary responses until he said:

"Grayson—Forey Grayson; didn't I see him here just now?"

A young man, with his overcoat closely buttoned and a gaudy scarf about his neck, came forward, received the letter and retired to the opposite side of the room to read it.

"Carter, Lafarge, Smith—here's something for myself," continued Cap Ryan; "Cohen, Fitch, McCarthy, Penrod. That's all, gentlemen."

"My sweetheart forgot to write, I guess," sighed Dobie Joe.

"Too thin, Dobie; don't try to play any sweetheart but the widow on us," said a bystander.

"Call it off, then; no sweetheart goes," laughed Dobie. "But there's no harm in a poor devil who never got a letter making believe there might be somebody in the world to write him one."

"See here, boys; this is a reward for a murderer," said Cap Ryan. "Tack it up over there, Dobie."

Dobie Joe fastened the placard to the wall, just behind Grayson. A crowd gathered about, most of whom were unable to get near enough to decipher it.

"Read it for us, Forey," called out someone at the rear of the throng.

Grayson thrust his letter into a pocket and, turning around, read aloud:

"$1,000 REWARD!

"For the arrest of Charles Dascomb, who is supposed to have murdered Justin Harrison, near Marysville, the 23d of August, 1852. Said Dascomb is about 22 years of age, 5 feet 10 inches high, well built, with regular features, brown hair, blue eyes and good teeth. The above reward will be paid by the undersigned upon his delivery at the county jail in Marysville.

"CHAS. H. JOHNSON,
"Sheriff of Yuba County."

"That's a pretty good description of yourself, Grayson," observed a tall man at the edge of the crowd.

"Do you mean that, Doc Greer?" asked Grayson sharply.

"I only said it in fun, of course," replied the other, turning away.

"I guess I won't take any stock in the hunt," remarked Dobie Joe. "That description will fit half the men on the Slope, excepting the hair."

"What, brown hair?" queried a bystander. "That's the commonest of all."

"No, not brown, nor black, nor red, but no hair at all—that's the commonest in these diggings."

"You're touchy on that point, Dobie."

"Well, perhaps my cocoanut does lay over the average a stack or two now, but you'll all size up to it before long. You may not believe it, but when I came here my head was shaggy as a buffalo's, and now it's bald as old Elijah's—see!" and to demonstrate the fact Dobie removed his vicuna and revealed a scalp white and smooth as an unripe buckeye. "It's the climate," he continued, "and it will curry all of you just the same. In less than five years a man with hair on his head in California can travel as a sideshow to a circus, and make it pay too. I wouldn't bet on Arkansaw's Indian there not getting bald."

The concluding remark was suggested by the sight of a Digger Indian who had just entered, and stood leaning against the wall near the door. He was a retainer of Arkansaw, and his presence excited no other remark than Dobie Joe's reference to his abundance of coarse black hair.

Just then there was a buzz of excitement at the faro table which attracted everybody thither. All eyes were centered on one of the players who was stacking up a lot of blue chips won on the last turn.

"How much is in the till, Doc?" he inquired of the dealer.

"About six thousand," was the reply.

"May I tap it, whatever it is?"

"If you like."

Salome.

By Mabel Porter Pitts.

The storm has past when you at length kneel down,
With pleading eyes where tears of sadness shine,
To place the jewel in your sorrow's crown
As one might lay a flower upon a shrine.

Within your breast but tenderness and grief;
No tumult now; the waves that swept the shore
To break your craft upon the waiting reef
Fall back to one vast monotone—"No more!"

And it is not, Salome, you alone
That hear these words! But souls in bitter pain
Where many a queen upon a fireside throne
Hides in her heart a John the Baptist slain.

Wheeler's Objection

There is only one man in Berkeley who has exhibited no enthusiasm over the proposed removal of the capital from Sacramento to the university town, and that unemotional gentleman is Dr. Benjamin Ide Wheeler. Not only has the project failed to arouse his enthusiasm; it has evoked his frown. But I am not surprised that President Wheeler should deprecate the project. I am amazed, however, at the puerility of his objection to the transplanting of the seat of government. It is entirely based on his passion for trees—not the trees of Berkeley but some that are flourishing on the capitol grounds. There is nothing discreditable in this passion. It is the fine, mystical sentiment of the classic scholar who revels fancifully in the old Greek life of the vineyards, who has a little of that feeling that the religion of Dionysus imparts, the primitive religion of tree-worship founded upon the belief that trees are the habitations of living spirits. But as the beautiful trees on the capitol grounds are not to be disturbed it is difficult to account for President Wheeler's objection. Indeed, the objection is somewhat unreasonable, for surely the hamadryads that gambol in the grove of Dodona at Sacramento, should hail with delight the departure of the satyrs that taint the atmosphere with the odors of graft during the sessions of the Legislature.

Sentiment Versus Business

One might appreciate the stand taken by President Wheeler if he had suggested the danger of contamination. Berkeley is now a highly moral town and it has a distinctive character the loss of which would be a calamity of incalculable proportions. The name of Berkeley is now a synonym of culture. As the state capital it would be known as the abiding place of vulgarity. Who knows but that the Greek Theatre would become a Temple of Graft, with Colonel Mazuma desecrating its sacred precincts with all the effrontery of a Goddess of Reason usurping the altar of Notre Dame. There are many sentimental reasons that might be urged by President Wheeler against the transplanting of the capital, but the probability is purely material considerations will prevail. Material considerations invariably outweigh the sentimental in these piping times of commercial progress. Berkeley is on the boom, town lots are jumping like villa sites in Los Angeles, and the majority of the inhabitants are new comers who are not obsessed with university tradition and who don't care a tinker's imprecation whether President Wheeler's prestige as grand cockalorum of the roost is threatened or not. Indeed there are many among them who would rejoice to see President Wheeler forced into a back seat, and they rejoice at the prospect of his being overshadowed in his own bailiwick by the Governor of the State. They voice the notion that in objecting to the removal of the capital he is less concerned for the trees in Sacramento than for the pre-eminence of the President of the University. "These university fellows," said a corner-lot owner to me the other day, "have been running the town long enough. Why do you know, you can't get a decent thing at a fruit store or a vegetable store or butcher shop? The frat houses have first pick. There's too much high caste over here to suit me. I'm in favor of making it more democratic." So great has been the growth of Berkeley that the people are talking of compelling the Key Route Company and the Southern Pacific Company to build an elevated road in Shattuck avenue. There are now eighty real estate agents in the town.

A Greater San Francisco

Sentiment in this city is unquestionably in favor of moving the state capital to Berkeley, and the people of Sacramento have good reason to be worried over the prospect. Aside from the geographical objections to Sacramento as the capital city, it has many prejudices to combat not the least of which is that which grew out of its hostility to Governor Gillett. Sentiment in this city is based upon the theory that it would advantage us in many respects to have the capital within easier reach. And whenever the matter is discussed one hears many expressions of sentiment in favor of a Greater San Francisco taking in the towns on the other side of the bay. It would not surprise me to see this sentiment crystallize in the near future. It is argued that by a Greater San Francisco we could solve the problem of purifying the city government. A wealthy citizen, who has given the matter much thought, said during the course of a discussion the other day, that many thousands of the residents of Alameda county have most of their financial interests in San Francisco and that if they were permitted to vote in this city would be able to change the complexion of our government. He thinks the coalition would be satisfactory to the people of Alameda county if the tax rates were segregated for each borough and it were agreed that they should be united only in the matter of a central government. "I am sure the project will carry," he said, "if put before the people of both counties."

Throttled By Japan

That the people of this state have good reason to worry over the influx of the Japanese is the opinion of Thomas Lawrence Browne of Liverpool who recently arrived in this city from the Orient. According to Mr. Browne the Japanese are addicted to the swarming habit and he says that wherever they settle they aim for supremacy and have an insidious way of getting the upper hand. He is full of interesting information on the subject of the absorption of Korea by the Japanese, and he says that Korea is now regarded as a dying nation. The history of the Japanese movement in Korea is quite interesting. In 1876 the independence of Korea was explicitly asserted in a treaty between that country and Japan. It was re-asserted in every subsequent treaty between Korea and Western nations, and although ignored by China, whom Korea had for many years recognized and treated as her suzerain, the Chinese Government finally renounced her somewhat shadowy claim to paternal control at the conclusion of the Chino-Japanese war in 1894. It was by Japan that this renunciation was forced on China, and it was Japan who encouraged the King of Korea to proclaim himself emperor. But in October, 1904, that weak-kneed sovereign was coerced by Count Ito into putting his signature to a document in which he requested Japan to assume a protectorate over his kingdom.

Roosevelt Complaisant

Mr. Browne says that it is well known in Korea and also in Tokio that the King was terrorized by Count Ito. Indeed it is also known that so reluctant was he to place himself under the tutelage of Japan that when the subject was first mooted the King sent a special messenger to the United States to protest against the action of the Japanese Government and to invoke the interference of President Roosevelt. This message was presented to the President by Mr. Homer Hulbert acting as the representative of the Korean monarch, but it was ignored. Mr. Hulbert, who is a citizen of this country, was very indignant over the President's indifference to the welfare of the people of Korea, and he recently published a book in London censuring Mr. Roosevelt and insisting upon the right of Korea to maintain her integrity and individuality. In this book, says Mr. Browne, the author sheds considerable light on the Japanese character, showing it to be quite different from what it has been pictured by the amiable Mr. Roosevelt. He describes the harsh and brutal treatment of Korean officials and people under Japanese rule. The country is being overrun by low-class Japanese settlers with whom might is the only law; the rights of property and ancient custom are rudely ignored and there is scant justice to be obtained by appeal to the Japanese courts. Life and property were insecure enough under the old regime, but it may be safely said there is not a single Korean, official, merchant or peasant who would not gladly exchange the veneer of Japanese improvement for a good wallow in the old mire of Korean corruption.

Japan the Terrier

Mr. Browne thinks it would be a good thing for California if Mr. Hulbert's book, which, by the way, is entitled "The Passing of Korea," were to become a best-seller in this country, for he paints a most repellant picture of Japanese character. He contends that there is no short cut to civilization as we understand the term. He maintains that Japan has emerged from the chrysalis state of feudalism into a butterfly condition of flashy brilliancy, and although he does not say it in so many words, he evidently believes that the future existence of Japan as compared with that of China and Korea will be brief as the butterfly's. But Mr. Browne says that whatever may be the future of China, it is morally certain that there is no long life for Korea with clipped wings. She is being absorbed. In his opinion one might rather liken Japan to a terrier than to a butterfly, to a sporting terrier which never lets go his hold once he has got a grip of his victim.

Some Hot Shot From Tokio

Perhaps it would be advisable for the Japanese and Korean League to get hold of Mr. Hulbert's book, and use it to offset the output of the Japanese bureau of publicity which is now working overtime. One of the press-agents of the Tokio government has been supplying the Boston papers with chatty letters descriptive of life in San Francisco. He writes from Tokio. This is an excerpt from a recent letter in the Boston Transcript which was reprinted by the New York Sun: "I cannot forget my first impression at the landing in San Francisco, some fifteen years ago, when I was spit at by a boy after being frightened by 'Hello, Jappy!'" My illusion that America would be kind to a poor Japanese was sadly destroyed then. And I observed two or three times in the streets of San Francisco a certain Dr. O'Donnell, who ran for Mayor without success, pulling a huge wagon with the red letters of 'Japs must go.'" This evoked from the Sun the following comments: "Same old San Francisco. Hasn't been changed a bit, not even by earthquake and fire. The Japanese and Korean Exclusion League is now on deck and Mayor Schmitz is warned by its honorable secretary that it will be better for him not to come back if he has made any agreement with the President 'by which Japanese children are to be allowed to attend the same schools as American children.'"

A Broadside Against Dogs

Long ago some truthful, simple poet wrote:

"Dogs delight to bark and bite,
For God hath made them so."

Lieutenant-Colonel Adam Slaker, U. S. Artillery, stationed at Fort Baker, has taken it upon himself to correct the decree of the Almighty regarding dogs, and to discredit the poet. He has made the barking dogs of Fort Baker—the innocent collies that joy in yelping as they run after sticks thrown by the fair ladies of the post—subjects of a military order that should live in history. It might have mouldered forgotten in the archives of war and never have received the publicity to which it is entitled but for a fortunate circumstance that placed it in my hands. Here it is—an order that shall make famous the dogs of Fort Baker and the officer in charge:

"The barking of dogs having been reported as a nuisance, it is hereby directed that dogs when let out for exercise or other purposes must be kept quiet. The encouraging of this barking by throwing stones or sticks or in any other way must stop. Dogs must be kept indoors between 9 p. m. and 7 a. m., and must be kept quiet at all times. Any further complaint will result in having the offending dogs removed from the post."

What say the dogs of war to that? And what say the ladies who own these dear collies that delight to run, barking joyously, after the sticks thrown by the said ladies? What could be said—for who dare disobey a military order emanating from a lieutenant-colonel? Of course, there are obstacles in the way of obeying the order. The ladies when taking their dogs out for exercise may refrain from throwing the alluring stick or the tempting stone, and in this way do their best to keep "Sweetheart," "Fido," "Blanche" and "Tray" from disturbing Fort Baker by unseemly noise. But suppose the beloved pet sees a cat, and with deep-mouthed growl pursues pussy to the nearest fence or tree, what can the owners do? Would the powers behind the army banish a dog just for that? And a lady might meet the garrison cow, which might shake her head and moo. Plainly it would be the duty of the dog to raise a terrific racket and scare the offending cow out of a week's milk. For such a thing as that would the army remove a dog from the post—a dog that had but done its duty in the only way within its power? Teddy forbid! I don't believe our beloved Theodore would sanction any such order as this. The man to whose ears the baying of the hounds that chase the bears and wildeats of Colorado is sweet music is not likely to sanction the banishing of the collies of Fort Baker simply because they bark. The order has but recently been issued, and I do not know what the effect has been. If the lieutenant-colonel is as stern as are his words the result should be chloroform and tears; for half the ladies at Fort Baker own collies, and all of them like to throw sticks and stones. But even if they forbear that amusement the cow and cat remain as tempters, not to speak of the burglar who burgles between 9 p. m. and 7 a. m., and at which any good collie would bark. I'm afraid it's chloroform.

Did She Lift It

Ella Wheeler Wilcox has long been known as the author of the verses that have for their opening line, "Laugh and the world laughs with you." In her book of pomes these verses are entitled "Solitude." Ask any of Ella's admirers what she ever wrote that is worth remembering, and you will invariably be reminded of the familiar platitudes that have been arranged in metrical sequence by way of lyrical logic in support of the thesis that if you laugh the world will laugh with you and that if you weep you will be permitted to perform the stunt alone. To these verses Ella's admirers proudly point on the theory that they are conclusive proof of her poetic genius. A claim to immortality, they think, may be safely based on this beautiful effusion. In the circumstances what could be more tragic than to deny the dithyrambic bard the credit for that composition; to kick from under her fame its only prop! That is what some heartless individual has done. He does not accuse Ella Wheeler Wilcox of plagiarism, but intimates that she lifted the thing bodily, as they say in the vernacular. The facts as he presents them are these: in December, 1862, at the Galt House, Louisville, Kentucky, Colonel John A. Joyce, at the request of George D. Prentice, wrote a poem entitled "So the World Goes," which was published shortly after in the Louisville Courier-Journal as follows:

"Laugh and the world laughs with you;

Weep, and you weep alone;

For this brave old earth must borrow its mirth,
It has troubles enough of its own,

But shrink from voicing care.

Rejoice, and men will seek you;
Grieve, and they turn and go;
They want full measure of all your pleasure,
But they do not want your woe,
Be glad, and your friends are many;
Be sad, and you lose them all:
There are none to decline your nectared wine,
But alone you must drink life's gall.

Feast, and your halls are crowded;
Fast, and the world goes by;
Succeed and give, and it helps you live,
But no man can help you die.
There is room in the halls of pleasure
For a long and lordly train,
But one by one we must all file on Through the narrow aisles of pain."

The Scotch Verdict

The literary archaeologist does more than spring the invidious parallel on a lady. He has the ungallant effrontery to inquire into the date of her birth and he asserts that the tremendous event occurred in the year 1855. Then with a vulgar snort of glee he brings the science of mathematics to bear in proof of the proposition that Ella Wheeler Wilcox could not have written the lyric gem which, in her book, is entitled "Solitude" and which differs from the Joyce effusion in only two or three words. Manifestly the proof is not conclusive. Ella Wheeler Wilcox was seven years old when Colonel Joyce scribbled his lines in the Galt House. Is it not likely that she wrote the pome long before the Colonel was called upon to prosodize? Bards, as we know, are born not made. They lisp in numbers. It is not unreasonable to assume that Ella came into the world a full-fledged odesmith equipped with the divine afflatus, and that one of the first of the salient facts of existence to which her muse called her attention is that when you laugh there is a broad grin on the face of the world. I am prepared to believe that Ella smote the lyre upon her entrance to this vale of verse and that most of her pomes were written before she reached the age of discretion.

Burgess Says He Did It

Who pulled down the Cogswell statue on lower Market street? As far as I remember the conspirators in that plot to discredit the sort of sculpture by which this city used to be exclusively adorned never made open confession and were never publicly found out. However it was generally understood that the old metal scarecrow was toppled from its pedestal by students of the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art as a protest against philistinism and a notice to their fellow-citizens that a higher artistic ideal had been cultivated since the ton of junk in the semblance of a man was put in place. But now comes Gelllett Burgess and confesses that he pulled down the statue. Burgess has won a great deal of attention in the East since he published his ingenious theory of the bromides and the sulphites—as much, if not more, than followed his discovery of the purple cow. One of the writers for the New York Times interviewed him a few days ago and the first question the creator of goopology was called upon to answer was—"What is the most sulphitic thing you ever did?" Burgess replied—"Pulling down the Cogswell statue in San Francisco." Then he explained that the incident occurred when he was a member of the faculty of the University of California. Of course it is not to be supposed that Burgess accomplished this piece of iconoclasm single handed and it would be interesting to know who were his confederates. It would also be interesting to know when he was elected a member of the Berkeley faculty.

Archibald Clavering Gunter

A piece of news of considerable interest to many residents of this city was the death in New York of Archibald Clavering Gunter, but it was given space and brief space at that in only one of our dailies. "Archie" Gunter was one of the pioneers of the California literary colony of New York, and from the pecuniary standpoint he was the most successful writer that ever came out of this State. He was not a graduate of the University of California as reported in one of the dailies, but received his education in the old City College conducted by the Rev. Dr. Burress. Among his schoolmates was Charles G. Yale and they afterward studied chemistry together in Thomas Price's laboratory. Four years ago when Gunter visited his old home he entertained Yale and a few more of his old schoolmates at luncheon in the Bohemian Club, and at the time he said that for many years the royalties from his books and plays aggregated one thousand dollars a week. Gunter never made any pretension to skill as a literary craftsman. He found after putting "Mr. Barnes of New York" on the market that novel-writing paid and that his name was worth money and he turned out books with wonderful facility. His experience in New York immediately after his advent to the metropolis was much the same as that of the proverbial unknown author. He packed the manuscript of "Mr. Barnes of New York" around town for weeks trying to find a publisher, and polite rebuffs were given him everywhere he went. But he had faith in his story and unlike the average struggling author he had money in his purse, for he inherited a fortune, and so he paid for the printing of his book. It became a best seller not only in this country but in England and it was translated into French and had a big sale in Paris.

An Atherton Paragraph

Some years ago Gertrude Atherton wrote of Gunter in the Cosmopolitan: "Although Mr. Gunter makes no claim to literary elegance few accomplished writers have written such a rattling good story as 'Mr. Barnes of New York' or achieved a more remarkable success. His books have been on every stand in three continents where our language is read, and by a large proportion of the reading public abroad he is regarded as the representative American author." The period of which Mrs. Atherton wrote was that in which Mr. Barnes and Mr. Potter were all the rage. The first successful work of a literary nature with which Gunter was connected was a drama entitled "Two Nights in Rome." It was produced in this city and the critics compared it with "Forget Me Not" and "Diplomacy." They hailed Gunter as a rising Sardou. He soon wrote another play, "The Soul of an Actress" which caught the fancy of Clara Morris who produced it in this city. Gunter's most successful play is "Prince Karl" which he wrote for Mansfield.

Our Neglected University

The University of California is receiving very shabby treatment from the legislature, and no effort is being made to create a sentiment in favor of persuading our representatives at Sacramento to deal more generously with that great educational institution. This matter of the neglect of the State University, in my opinion, is worthy of the attention of public spirited citizens especially of those interested in the development of this section of the state. We may derive as much material advantage from the University as from the improvement of the physical aspects of this city. The University should be the centre of all the intellectual activity of the state. We should be taught to appreciate the University in its elemental idea as a source of civilization as was beautiful Athens of old whose schools drew to her bosom and then sent back to the business of life for a thousand years the youth of the Western world. Our University may not realize our ideals at present: it does not supply the true principles to popular enthusiasm; instead of striving to raise the intellectual tone of society it is busy turning out economists, merchants and engineers. But some day it will have an awakening, and when that day comes it should be adequately equipped for the work in hand. Therefore if the alumni are not to be moved by pride in their Alma Mater to get together and persuade the legislators, I will commend the University to the concern of the California Promotion Committee. The University asked the Legislature for $250,000 for a new library building. The request was denied. Yet the library, which has grown during President Wheeler's regime from 80,000 to 200,000 volumes, is housed in a small wooden building. A request was made for $250,000 for the erection of an agricultural building which is needed as much, if not more, than the library building. The members of the agricultural faculty are rendering service of the very greatest importance to the people of this state. It is safe to say that they are saving the farmers and agriculturists thousands upon thousands of dollars yearly, and yet they are crowded into such close quarters that they are able to carry on their work efficiently only with the very greatest difficulty. The department of entomology, whose service to the state has been boundless, is obliged to carry on its important work in an old discarded wing of the gymnasium. The department of veterinary surgery and the state hygienic laboratory are crowded together in a small building which hardly deserves the name of a shed. The departments of viticulture, animal industry and horticulture are compelled to do their work and keep their stores in the main agricultural building, which is only a plain wooden structure ill-equipped for the work which the department is in duty bound to do. Yet the request for a sum which was certainly none too great for the erection of a building worthy to house the department of agriculture was cut down from $250,000 to $150,000.

Greek Theatre Events

The Greek Theatre at the University of California is to become during the present semester more completely than ever the home of music and the drama. Every Thursday afternoon from March to the end of the university year in May there will be music in the theatre, either by the University Orchestra, the Minetti String Quartette, or by the University Chorus. An opera, a Greek play, and a Sanskrit play will be the dramatic events of the term. The University Orchestra, now consisting of sixty professional musicians, and conducted by Professor Wolle, has won for itself a warm place in the hearts of all music-lovers in this vicinity and to a certain extent throughout the state. It will inaugurate its second year of symphony concerts at three o'clock Friday afternoon, March 1, when it will furnish accompaniment for a recital by Rosenthal, one of the greatest living pianists. On Thursday afternoons not taken up with Symphony Concerts, programmes will be rendered at 3 o'clock by the Minetti String Quartette. They will furnish music in the Greek Theatre on March 7, 21 and April 4. The members of the quartette are: Mr. Giulio Minetti, concert-master of the University Orchestra; Mr. Anton Koenig and Mr. Andre Verdier, violinist in the orchestra, and Mr. Arthur Weiss, its first cellist. On the evening of Charter Day, that is, March 23, after the address of President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University, there will be presented the Verdi opera of "Aida" with Lillian Nordica among the principals, chorus, and full orchestra. These very interesting events will be supplemented by the presentation of two plays by the students of the University; the "Eumenides" of Aeschylus and the Sanskrit comedy called "The Little Clay Cart." "Eumenides," a play full of tragic beauty, could be given in no more felicitous environment than that of the Greek Theatre, itself a tradition of an earlier time. This will be the third Greek play given by the students, the two former being "The Birds" of Aristophanes which came as a part of the festival with which the theatre was dedicated, and the "Ajax" of Sophocles. The date set for "Eumenides" is April 18. The Sanskrit comedy will be given a week or two earlier on April 6. "The Little Clay Cart" has been translated and adapted for the occasion by Dr. Arthur W. Ryder, instructor in Sanskrit in the University. The comedy will be of surpassing interest, coming as it does from so remote a land as India, a representation of a civilization so different from our own, and yet retaining the eternal humor of essential human nature.

The Great New York Drama

In the Thaw case are combined all the important energies of a great drama, but it is so complex of plot that it is difficult to take a comprehensive view of all its aspects. Of course the central theme is quite obvious. Interest converges upon the outcome of the trial, but the defendant is only one of many figures whose emotions affect the audience. It is a drama that abounds in conflicts and problems and contradictory sentiments and the threads of intrigue are woven with all the deftness of perfect craftsmanship. It is as though the sequence of effects were governed by a code of fixed technical rules and the suspense is maintained as much by the characters behind the scenes as those in the full glare of the calcium. Mrs. Thaw's mother has not appeared in the courtroom but surely her presence has been felt, and there is as much curiosity respecting her as there is in respect of the protagonists that appear in every scene to occupy the stage centre. No small fraction of the element of suspense has been due to the part which she has played in the grim drama though she has remained ensconced in the wings. What could be more poignantly dramatic than this conflict in real life between mother and daughter? And who will say that he thoroughly appreciates the sentiments of each toward the other? We see the daughter alternately repudiating her mother for the sake of a husband and shielding that mother in a measure from blame and shame partly, perhaps, because of her sense of the shame of having such a mother and partly through fear of provoking the mother to bitter hostility. We see a brother antagonistic to his unfortunate sister, and we feel that howsoever vicious the latter may be she is at least entitled to commiseration on having sprung from such a family.

Some of the Features

And almost dominating every scene of this stirring drama of real life is the ghost of the whited sepulchre of the mirrored Tower famous for its velvet swing and other alluring devices for the promotion of lust. And through the morbid exhalations from the putrescent past stalk the figures of morally maimed females and tenderloin rouses to revive recollections of the paphian revels that constituted the prologue of this highly salacious dramatic masterpiece. Not the least of the vital elements of the drama is that which springs from the rivalries among the lawyers. In these are comprised a subplot as thrilling as that which involves the main issue. And it is through this element that the comic relief is supplied. For what could be funnier than the jealousies provoked by the ex-Napoleon of the California bar and the ebullitions of his faithful squire McPike. These are matters that are not given the space they deserve in the dispatches. One has to read the New York dailies to learn of the soreness of Delmas's associates and of Jerome's resentment of the spectacular effects achieved by the unknown barrister from the Wild and Woolly. The District Attorney has been most querulous from the beginning, and he never loses an opportunity to remind Delmas that he is trying the case on the Atlantic and not on the Pacific Coast. Though Delmas is not at his best in rapid-fire exchanges of smart repartee, being a very dignified practitioner, nevertheless he has more than held his own, frequently sending home some sharp thrusts but always in the most polite language, as for instance when reminded one day of an Atlantic Coast custom he retorted: "It is one that by the learned District Attorney is more honored in the breach than in the observance."

McPike on Their Nerves

The grievances of Delmas's associates were explained to a New York Sun reporter the other day as follows: "The attitude of Mr. Delmas and Mr. McPike has not pleased the New York lawyers. Whenever there was a mistake in handling Thaw's case Mr. Delmas has blamed his colleagues, excepting Mr. McPike, of course. Mr. Delmas is not over familiar with the laws of this state and when he was tripped up by District Attorney Jerome he has blamed the New York lawyers for not keeping him properly posted. He has also had some criticism to make of the way the case has been prepared. On the other hand, whenever a point was made for the defense Mr. Delmas and Mr. McPike have taken the whole credit. This has not been pleasing to Messrs. Hartridge, Gleason, Peabody and Dan O'Reilly. They think that they are at least entitled to some of the limelight. When Mr. McPike, in an interview, severely criticized the manner in which District Attorney Jerome has been conducting the case it was a good opportunity for the four lawyers who are opposed to Mr. Delmas and Mr. McPike to put in their kick. As a result Mrs. William Thaw issued a statement in which she excluded Mr. McPike from the case, naming the five other lawyers as having been retained to defend her son." Mr. McPike was not slow in getting back. He was interviewed the next day. "Mr. Delmas will show before this case is over," said Mr. McPike, "that he is the master of District Attorney Jerome. Mr. Delmas did not come from the West to learn law, but to show persons here a thing or two about the manner in which a case should be conducted. He scored heavily on Mr. Jerome yesterday when he showed him the law in New York State on the admission of oral statements by a defendant. The error made by the District Attorney was the worst I ever saw. We would not have cared a snap for a conviction if this testimony had not been admitted. This talk about the District Attorney asking for the appointment of a commission is his last desperate gasp. He knows that he has been beaten."

The Hearst Way

A new and characteristic story of William R. Hearst's generosity is being told. It was shortly after the fire that he came into the Examiner office one day about noon and said to "Blinker" Murphy: "Murphy, I have an appointment here at one o'clock with a German and his wife, who were burned out and want to go to Germany. They were in to see me yesterday, and I promised to consider getting them transportation. I can't be here at one, but you get them tickets to New York, and write to Tom Williams about arranging their passage across the Atlantic." "What are their names?" asked Murphy. "Why, I don't know their names—didn't ask them," said Hearst. "You ask them and fix up the tickets." "But," said Murphy, "how am I to know the family? There might be a whole flock of Germans up here that you had promised to send to the Fatherland." "No," said Hearst, "they are the only ones—that is, the only Germans."

Mrs. Shawhan Writes of Pages

To Ada Romer-Shawhan Town Talk is indebted for a timely appreciation of Jules Pages, the most distinguished of Californian artists. "It will be interesting," writes Mrs. Shawhan, "for San Franciscans to know that they have amongst them at present the celebrated Californian painter, Jules Pages. The gallery of Vickery, Atkins & Torrey on California street where an exhibition of his paintings has been opened should prove for the next week or two the

Peasant Hut—Coast of Brittany

Mecca of all lovers of art and students of painting. Jules Pages has a personality no less interesting than his pictures; simplicity, breadth, strength and honesty of purpose are bodied forth in his character as well as in his drawings. In spite of the ten years of hard study which preceded his achievement of the first rank of modern painters he still retains a boyish enthusiasm for his life work that is infectious and encouraging to the young student intent on perfecting himself in the beautiful but difficult art of painting. On a recent visit to the atelier of his father, who, during the days of Virgil Williams, Tavernier, Rix, Brooks, Narjot Nahl and Robinson was the organizer of the Palatte Club, and is now with Robinson one of the sole survivors of the old regime of artists, I found Jules Pages surrounded by his family and busily at work on the preliminary sketches made about the city since the fire. These sketches are reconstruction studies which he has made for canvases which he hopes to show to the people of France on his return to Paris to resume his duties as one of the instructors of the Julian Academy. It was but natural, brought up in the artistic atmosphere of his father's studio, that Pages should have decided to become a painter. In 1890, after studying a short period at the San Francisco School of Design, he became one of the staff of the San Francisco Examiner, worked hard, saved his money, a trip to Paris to study under the masters being the object in view. After two years spent in hard study,—his first picture sent to the Salon having been accepted, receiving honorable mention, he returned to San Francisco to assume the management of the Art Department of the Examiner, at the time when Davenport, Swinnerton, Fisher and others combined to make that paper the best illustrated daily in the United States. Having earned sufficient money he again resumed his studies in Paris, and after three years of unremitting endeavor he won in 1899 the Medaille d'Or du Salon, the first ever awarded a Californian. The picture that brought this triumph was afterwards purchased by popular subscription here and presented to the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art. It is called 'In the Studio.' It is among the paintings that were saved from the fire. Above the gold medal is still another prize, the final crown to an artist's achievement, the 'Hors Concours' (beyond competition) which entitles the holder to exhibit his work at the Salon without its being judged by the Jury. This crowning honor was bestowed upon Pages in 1905. So jealously is this honor guarded by the French Government that despite constant striving for many years, upon only five of the innumerable Americans that have exhibited in Paris, has it been bestowed. The five are Sargent, Seymour, Thomas, Miller and Pages. No doubt, some day, if all goes well, the crimson of the Legion d' Honneur will blossom on the lapel of the coat of Jules Pages, who will then have received the final consecration. It is his intention from now on to keep in touch with his native city and state by spending his vacations here, the Julian Academy allowing him six months every other year. Would it not be a graceful thing on the part of the San Francisco Art Association and School of Design, so soon to rise again and rebuild in a modest way, on the property formerly occupied by the Hopkins mansion, to extend an invitation to Mr. Pages to criticize the work of the students at the school during the time he spends his vacations amongst us? Would it not be most advantageous to the students to feel something of the broadening influence of a painter on whom the French Government has seen fit to bestow its highest honors?"

A Study of the Nude

Sea Shore—Coast of Brittany

Hitch in the Sullivan Settlement

The settlement of the Sullivan Trust Company failure in Goldfield is not going along as smoothly as was expected. The big influence wielded by the reorganization committee in Nevada has brought all the creditors in that section into line, but most of the creditors in San Francisco are chaps of another calibre and they don't propose to answer the roll call till they have a satisfactory guarantee that they will get the money due them. They were caught in sums ranging from $3,000 to $20,000, trading in stocks for Sullivan, and they insist on getting every penny the assets will allow. They have discussed the matter among themselves and have a plan of campaign for self-protection mapped out.

Rickey Ready for Business

T. B. Rickey, president of the reorganized Sullivan Company, is generally recognized as a man of ability and sound financial standing. After a half dozen delays, some on account of sickness, he finally arrived in town at the close of last week and gave out that he was willing to discuss the situation with the local creditors. The local creditors did not fall over each other in trying to get an offer from him. In fact they took the matter rather indifferently. They realize that the men behind the Sullivan reorganization have got to come to them. The fact of the matter is that certain Nevada money interests that lost heavily in the failure are the back bone of the organization committee. Some of the local creditors strongly suspect that this clique is looking after its own welfare first in the settlement and that after it has paid itself in full whatever remains of the assets will be distributed among the rest of the creditors. These local creditors will demand a guarantee that they will receive as much as the clique before they will sign any agreement. Rickey has been flatly asked to give this guarantee but so far he has tactfully avoided committing himself in any shape.

Sharp Slump in Sullivan Stocks

Matters are now reaching a crisis where something must be done. The Sullivan mines, the back bone of the assets, are reported in a fairly good condition, but the prices of their shares have slumped badly since it became suspected that there was a hitch in the settlement. Except when an account is flung on the market scarcely anything is done in their issues. Traders seem to be afraid of them at any price. If any clique has a line on coming events and artfully contemplates gathering them in at low figures they certainly have a chance. Apparently Sullivan himself is completely out of the present storm center. He was at Byron Springs last week and dropped into town on a flyer, but his coming and going were most unostentatious for a man who cut such a figure as a promoter and then failed for a quarter million. The men who are handling the reorganization are confident they can get the assets into shape to pay dollar for dollar—that is if the local creditors will do as they are told. But the local brokers won't unless they get the required guarantee.

Joy in a Great Triumph

Down in the engineering department of the Southern Pacific Company the boys and the graybeards are bragging a great deal over the recent success of that department in at last forcing the Colorado River out of the Salton Sea basin. The problem has been one of the biggest the S. P. corps ever tackled. So great was the problem and such vast interests hinged on the success of its solution that President Roosevelt stepped in a few months ago and proposed sending the crack U. S. engineers to the assistance of the railroad men. The matter was finally settled by the government setting aside $2,000,000 to be applied to restraining the inflowing river. The actual work was left to the S. P. engineers as they were admitted to be most familiar with the points to be combatted. Their success is a great feather in the cap of the department as several Eastern engineers of high standing have gone on record as declaring that the Colorado would never again be turned back into its old channel. The

S. P. office will now have the satisfaction of making out its bill to the government for Uncle Sam has promised to stand his share of the expense out of the $2,000,000 appropriation. And that is why the members of the engineering department are now going around with broad smiles of elation on their faces.

Fought the Flood for Two Years

It cost the railroad company over half a million dollars before it began to get a line on the intricacies of the problem of restraining the big river. Time and again the river was checked only to break out in some new place and with its rising flood destroy tracks, stations, freight sheds and telegraph lines. Back went the indomitable engineers to attack the problem at new points. For over two years they have been struggling with the impetuous flood. Now they are convinced they have it under full control.

Cause of the Trouble

The damage done has been incalculable; it easily reaches two millions. The cause of all the trouble was one of the irrigation companies that sprang up when Imperial valley was put on the market for settlement. The soil was a rich silt that with a little irrigating water, under a southern sun, would yield prodigious crops. Imperial valley lies several hundred feet below the sea level and a still greater number of feet below the bed of the Colorado river. The engineers of the company tapped the river bank to obtain the necessary water. They got it all right. When more ranchers flocked into the valley they made more taps in the bank. Things ran along till there were over twelve thousand settlers, towns and villages had sprung up and the values on the improved farms had reached a handsome figure. One day the engineers were making a new tap to meet the immensely growing irrigating business when along came a freshet in the river. The impetuous flood gouged a great channel through the bank and swept like a Niagara on the villages, farms, railroad tracks and other property in the valley far below.

Greatest Lake in the West

Month in and month out it poured an incessant foaming flood except when occasionally checked by the S. P. engineers. Experts from all over the country offered suggestions but do what they might the great inland sea kept growing. At one time it formed a sheet of inland water as large as Lake Tahoe. Had it gone on unchecked it would eventually have become as large as Lake Ontario. Even now it is half as big as the state of Rhode Island and almost a hundred feet deep in spots. There are sail boats on it and launches, and if the evaporation does not eat it up too quickly small steamers will be added. This new lake naturally has had a marked effect upon the climate of that section. The settlers who were flooded out are in a bad way, for it will probably be many years before they again set eyes on their water-covered property. Suits have been filed against the irrigation company that started the trouble but the chance of reimbursement from that source is practically nil.

A Wine Shower at Blingum

The polo players from Southern California did not win out against Blingum in the finals but they were treated so royally that even the most loyal southerner did not have a twinge in his temper over defeat. A rash Blingumite had promised the Southern teams that the only dry thing about their visit would be the weather, so the first night when the plash of rain drops beat on the club roof careless remarks were passed. "Put up your umbrellas, boys," commanded the Prince of Good Fellows, "and I'll show you the kind of stuff we wet them with here." Up went the umbrellas, in spite of bad luck adages, and splash went a couple of quarts of extra dry over their silken tops! And thus was a new standard in wine spilling established. Not since the last big polo tournament has there been such a mad merry round of frolicking in Blingum.

Open House at Blingum

All the smart hostesses had their homes done up in curl papers a week beforehand, preparatory to keeping "open house" during the tournament. The Charley Clarks entertained the largest house party. Mrs. Clark's sister, Mrs. Raoul du Val, is visiting her, and her brother Dick is also with the Clarks pending the completion of his own residence. Then they have some English guests and several people who motored down from town for the races stayed over Sunday with them. The bracelet which Mrs. Clark offered as a prize to the lady who should pick the winner in the "Ladies' Plate Race" was not hotly contested. Somehow the word was sent over the Wireless Thought transmitters that it was "bad form" for any but the wives or relatives of the owners of the horses to place a guess, so only four or five women tried to name the winner. Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels won the bracelet on one of the ponies belonging to her husband.

Mrs. Martin Will Take a Rest

In spite of the fact that Lenten restrictions have been found elastic enough to stretch over bridge whist, skating and pony racing, an unusual number of society people are going to spend a week in the "Retreat" which will shortly be held at Sacred Heart convent. Mrs. Eleanor Martin has decided to enter the "Retreat" and so will her granddaughter, Miss Genevieve Harvey. Mrs. Martin does society much more strenuously than Genevieve, so she doubtless feels the need of a respite for religious reflection. Almost all the young girls in society who are Catholics will go into the "Retreat" but as yet Mrs. Martin is the only society dowager who has announced her intention of parting the giddy year with a bit of convent quiet.

She's Going Awai

Frances Joliffe confessed over the informal tea cup the other day that her reason for returning to San Francisco was not to lend the distinction of her stub pen to the columns of an evening paper but on a mission that will take her to Tonopah! More than that Frances would not divulge and even baiting ones interrogations with such choice persiflage as "a little atmosphere for a mining drama" does not make her rise to the defensive, so the errand that takes this adventurous young woman to Tonopah while her sisters flit through the smart drawing-rooms of San Francisco and Burlingame is still wrapped in mystery.

The Henry-Riggs Engagement

I understand that the day before Dr. Riggs sailed for the Orient a few intimates were taken into the secret of his engagement to Mrs. Malcolm Henry. The secret sprang a public leak when Mrs. Henry instituted divorce proceedings but the interested parties hastily attempted to plug up the hole. It is now generally believed that the affair is of more substantial stuff than dreams are made of and covert congratulations are being passed to the lady, who, like another fair woman, doth protest too much. The marriages of the Voorhies girls only goes to prove that Mother proposes but man disposes. Mrs. Voorhies has always been opposed to her daughters marrying into brass-button service and yet two of her daughters have married into the service and a third is said to have given her promise. Leila, the youngest daughter, married Lieutenant Guy Scott, a son of the Senator from West Virginia. Then Marie, the eldest, married Captain Young, and now the navy gets an inning. The only other daughter is Mrs. Thomas Bishop Jr.

The Latest Report

The latest report from Helen Dean is that she will spend the coming summer in San Rafael with her mother. As I was the first to give publicity to the rumor of her engagement with a New Yorker, I am reluctant to throw a doubt on it, especially as my information came from a source that seemed authoritative, but one of her friends insists that the report was premature and assures me that Miss Helen is still heart whole and fancy free. As she has been reported engaged almost as many times as was her close friend Mrs. Spencer Eddy confirmation of the latest denial would cause no astonishment in society.

for so long that they had forgotten how delightful California was, and their glowing descriptions have almost persuaded Lady Hesketh to return on a visit. Lady Hesketh was recently quite ill and was obliged to remain in London to be treated which was a great hardship to her as she is devoted to the country. She is one of the most famous cross-country riders in England, and her horses are among the finest. After the fire in this city she put up her hunters at auction and closed her country house in Ireland. So interested has she become in horses and out of door sports that society in London sees very little of her. She still dresses smartly I hear and is a friend of Mrs. Hwfa (pronounced Hooper) Williams who says she can only stand smartly dressed people about her.

News From Miss Bowie

Bessie Bowie, I hear, will do drawing-room singing in London during the coming season there. Her teacher, Jean de Reszke, says she is ready for Grand Opera, but Miss Bowie feels that her health is not strong enough to warrant her taking up so strenuous a career. After her season in London she will probably concertize in the United States. She is at present working with Jean de Reske in Paris.

Mrs. Albert Gerberding is in New York and will probably remain there until summer. She contemplates going to Europe for several years. She is busy at work on a play of Western life which she expects to place before going to Europe.

The Sutton Sisters

Miss May Sutton, formerly woman lawn tennis champion of Great Britain and the United States, and her sister, Miss Florence, were the stars of the recent annual tennis tournament at Coronado Beach. Miss May Sutton won the 1907 championship of the Coronado Country Club in ladies' singles after defeating her sister, Miss Florence, in the final round, 6-0, 6-0. Miss Florence played an excellent game and many of her brilliant returns drew applause from the spectators. Unless we watched the score carefully, there did not seem to be much difference between the play of the two famous sisters, yet Miss May nearly always made the point. A peculiarity of Miss May's game, which no doubt largely accounts for her invincibility, is that she never plays slackly or carelessly, no matter how certain she may be of beating her opponent. Nor does any consideration of mercy to a gallant but weaker opponent enter into her play. She plays to win every stroke and has no qualms about crushing her adversary, even when she is one of her own sisters, unmercifully. With an equal determination Miss Florence, though defeat stares her in the face from the moment she begins a game, plays with grim earnestness, as though she might really beat her formidable sister. Smiling and gentle as Miss May Sutton looks under ordinary circumstances, when she takes up her position on a tennis court her face assumes a keen and almost hard look. This is the second time that Miss May Sutton has won the ladies' singles at Coronado, so that her name now appears as the 1906 and 1907 winner on the big hammered silver pitcher that forms the championship trophy. She has received two replicas of the trophy, of smaller but substantial size. Her sister, Miss Florence, a runner-up in 1906 and 1907, has won two gold medals of the Coronado Country Club. A third victory will make Miss May Sutton the owner of the championship trophy.

The Tournament

On account of the absence of Mrs. Bruce and Miss Gabrielle Dobbins of Pasadena, whose play is inferior only to that of Miss May and Miss Florence Sutton, the ladies' events lacked something of the interest they had last year. Miss May Sutton and her partner A. E. Bell won the mixed doubles, beating Miss Florence Sutton and S. M. Sinsabaugh 6-1, 6-0 in the final round. In the men's singles Grant Smith of San Francisco and Percy Murdock of Alameda, champion and runner-up in singles and winners of the men's doubles last year, being absent, the way was left clear for the Los Angeles players, A. E. Bell and T. C. Bundy. In the singles Bundy beat Bell 7-5, 3-6, 6-3, and won the men's championship. In the men's doubles Bell and Bundy beat Sinsabaugh and Browne 2-6, 6-1, 3-6, 6-3, 6-3. The men's consolation event was won by Sydney Morgan, who beat A. H. Keeney in the final round. The tournament lasted four days, being somewhat interrupted by rain on the third day.

Some National Characteristics

The appearance of Miss May Sutton in public always raises the question of her nationality. No one who is familiar with her sturdy, stocky figure, full of grit and determination, and who has had the pleasure of hearing her soft, gentle voice, could entertain much doubt of her being an English girl, as in fact she is. Her father was an officer in the British Navy and she was born in Plymouth, one of the most important English naval stations. The fact that in California lawn tennis may be played almost all the year round has enabled her to get the constant practice that is essential to the making of a champion. But the lack of high-class players of her own sex, with whom to do battle, is a drawback that more than counterbalances the advantages offered by the Californian climate for all-the-year-round play. Were it not for her own sisters, Miss May Sutton would have no adversaries worthy of her skill and would never have won the British championship. In almost every English county she could find girls who would make her play to beat them.

From Cairo I hear of the great popularity of Mrs. C. O. Alexander, who is chaperoning pretty Miss Bergen on an indefinite jaunt to all the show places of the old world. Mrs. Alexander it seems has been taken to the heart of the British colony there which is quite a social triumph for the English have always held rather aloof from Americans sojourning in Cairo. An English baronet is particularly interested in Mrs. Alexander and I hear the hotel guests are wondering whether she will accept his suit or that of a wealthy American who is also a devotee at her shrine. Mrs. Alexander went armed with letters from Mrs. Gus Spreeckels and some of our San Francisco granddames, and they seem to have stood her in excellent stead. After Cairo Mrs. Alexander and Miss Bergen leave for Europe and will be in London during the season.

Roller Polo

The third and fourth games of the five game series between the Auditorium of San Francisco and the Vallejo roller polo team were played at the Auditorium rink on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, February 23d and 25th, resulting in a tie on Saturday night and a victory for the home team, score 1 to 0, in the Sunday afternoon game. These two games were the most exciting yet played as could very easily be seen by the enthusiasm of the large audience present at the two games. Both games were very evenly contested, consisting of three ten minute periods. The afternoon game exceeded the previous one in interest, four innings being played before a goal could be made. The line up of the home team is as follows: A. C. Smith, manager, captain, first rush; O. Langdon, second rush; J. C. Knight, half back; T. F. Meaney, goal tender; A. Long, center; C. Harris, substitute; E. J. Bennett, referee. The line up of the Vallejo team is as follows: A. Wood, first rush; C. O'Donnell, second rush and captain; B. McCaffery, center; W. Demmon, half back; F. ## "Salome" and the Criticasters

So great is the interest in the Colonial Theatre's artistic production of "Salome" that the great masterpiece will not be withdrawn at the close of this week. It has plenty of drawing power for another week. Indeed it is one of the immortals that in the years to come will prove a profitable gap-filler for many a stock house. Though Professor Gayley of Berkeley has not yet responded to Town Talk's invitation to discuss the qualities of the tragedy from the standpoints of drama and literature, academic light is not inaccessible. Dr. Nathan I. Rubinkam of the Chicago University has been discussing "Salome," and his views are somewhat the same as those expressed in Town Talk last week. I earnestly commend them to the perusal of the two local criticasters that adapted their perceptive faculties for the discernment of evidences of perversion in the play. "Everything illustrated by the drama," says Rubinkam, "is in the every day world about us. We cover ourselves with the veil of culture, and then are horrified that art should reveal the beauty of the human form. The New York critics wrote in a singularly indecent manner about the opera and sniffed for garbage and found it where others saw nothing."

Nance As the Sorceress

One of the big theatrical events scheduled for the coming week is a production of Sardou's "The Sorceress" with Nance O'Neil as the star. In this play the Californian tragedienne appears as the beautiful Moorish heroine Zoraya, who all unconsciously enmeshed her lover in the toils of the Inquisition, and to save him, even when he proved false, joyfully accepted shame and torture and death. This sorceress, who is a paragon of chastity, who culls herbs by moonlight, who mesmerizes at will, and administers prussic acid in capsules; who is a devoted Mohammedan, but so well versed in the principles of Christianity that she is able to take her stand at the altar and confound the Cardinal of the Inquisition. "The Sorceress" is most sumptuously mounted scenically, and the company of forty players in support of Miss O'Neil is said to be an admirable one. The play is an English adaptation of the piece written by Sardou for Mme. Sarah Bernhardt and is designedly well filled with emotional crises.

Butterfly Teas and Dinners

In New York the coming of Puccini's opera "Madam Butterfly" brought in its train an added taste for things Japanese, affording the exclusive society circles an excuse for numerous charming functions. Mrs. Clarence Mackay, Mrs. Alfred Vanderbilt, Mrs. George Gould and others gave Japanese parties that were elaborately described in the society columns. Mrs. Mackay, who is a musical enthusiast herself and who had three box parties during the first week at the Garden Theatre, gave a "Butterfly" party that attracted wide attention on account of the elaborate decorations. It was called an iris-wistaria dinner, for which covers for ten were laid. The whole affair was described as a symphony in purple. From walls and ceiling lights were hung amid clusters of drooping wistaria. There was no contrasting scheme, even the lamps were screened in the mute color. The cloth, a delicate creation in heliotrope with a wide insertion of Japanese filigree in gold thread, was laid over a demicloth of pure white. The table's garnishings were Florida iris—those deep expressive purple flowers—more orchid than lily. Even the ices were mauve colored. The table favors were miniature water color copies of the Madam Butterfly poster designed by Hoenstein of Milan.

Our Big New Playhouse

The opening of the new and magnificent Van Ness Theatre at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Grove street will be the great social and theatrical event of the month and already the mail orders for seats for the opening night run up into thousands of dollars. The playhouse will be the finest San Francisco has ever had. Wide aisles, comfortable opera chairs, immense exits and every convenience known to the modern builder of theatres have been placed in the playhouse. The opening performance of "Madam Butterfly" is to take place on Monday night, March 11. Gottlob, Marx & Co. have secured this immense attraction and it will prove a fitting bill for the inaugural of the new house. "Madam Butterfly" will be seen for four times only: Monday evening, March 11; Tuesday evening, March 12; Wednesday matinee, March 13; Wednesday evening, March 13. The advance sale of seats opens Monday morning at the music store of Kohler and Chase. The prices are to be $3.00, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 and $1.00.

been engaged to play the role of Suzuki, the Japanese maid. Miss Houston is a pupil of Bouhy, of Paris where she studied and sang for several years before coming to America. She was one of the singers Mr. Savage signed three years ago for his English Grand Opera company and sang with great success throughout the season, taking such roles as Ortrude, Amneris and Venus. Later she returned to Paris for further study and has been re-engaged as one of the six prima donnas who are now winning success in Puccini's fascinating masterpiece. Miss Houston comes from the well-known Southern family of Houstons and is a grandniece of the celebrated Sam Houston. Her home is in Birmingham, Alabama.

An Independent House

Messrs. Will Greenbaum and Harry Bishop have leased the big theatre at the "Chutes" for a long term of years. At the conclusion of the season of grand opera a first-class melodramatic stock company will be installed and the best melodramas produced at popular prices. This house is well suited to big spectacular effects and at the same time the acoustic properties are such that the most refined comedy may be successfully presented. We may expect to witness at this house some very fine productions. Greenbaum & Bishop are independent of booking syndicates and will play any first-class organization that wishes to visit the city.

Mr. Carl Haydn

Who will make his first appearance here in "The Wild Rose" at the American Theatre, March 4, is an Austrian and a descendant of the famous composer of the same name. He began life in an atmosphere of music. A sister is now singing in the famous La Scala Theatre of Milan, and a second in the past won a reputation as a soloist in Hamburg and other European cities. The young Haydn developed a pleasing boy soprano voice at an early age and was soon singing in public. When his parents died the young singer took up the study of music more seriously than before, visiting Vienna, Milan, Florence, Berlin and London in search of higher education in vocal art. Among his many teachers was the well-known Ulanowski, to whom he says he owes most of what training was beneficial. He became acquainted with Leoncavelli, composer of "Il Pagliacci," and appeared in several of his operas. He sang in concert with Johann Strauss and traveled with Patti one season on a tour through the British Isles. Carl Haydn is one of the very few tenors who can act as well as sing. His manner is as graceful and easy as his tones are pure and sweet. He has studied and fitted himself for either dramatic or lyric roles and says that he finds himself complaining as other tenors have done that he must always play the lover and seldom is given a chance to sing dramatic numbers. One of his commendable characteristics is a desire to continue his study and go higher in his art. Reginald De Koven himself secured the young tenor last year for "Happyland," De Wolf Hopper's success. Mr. De Koven wrote "The Student King" especially for Mr. Haydn.

Messrs. Will Greenbaum and H. W. Bishop announce a season of two weeks of grand opera by the San Carlo Company of about 175 artists the first three days of which will be devoted to Oakland and the balance to San Francisco. The opening will be at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Manager Bishop's fine Oakland theatre, Monday evening March 18th, with "La Gioconda" and the cast will include Nordica, Montibaldini, Conti-Borlinetti, Fornai, de Sogurolo and the wonderful Spanish tenor Constantino. "Carmen." The following week will be devoted to "Il Trovatore" with Nordica, "Rigoletto" with Nielsen and Campanari in the title role, the new opera "Adrienne Lecouvreur" with Tarquini as Adrienne, "La Traviata" with Nordica and an all star cast of "Les Huguenots." Seats for the first week's performances will be on sale Thursday March 14 at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, on Van Ness avenue, just above California, and the prices will be less than half charged by the other big companies. This it is possible to do on account of the enormous seating capacity of the Chutes Theatre. The United Railways promise special service during this engagement and special cars will be run at the conclusion of the performances.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The only way to increase the prosperity of the Orpheum would be to enlarge the building. The high standard of excellence attained by the attractions at this theatre have imparted a new and artistic significance to the word vaudeville. The programme for the week beginning next Sunday matinee, in the words of the press agent, "like good wine, needs no bush." He is very enthusiastic over Ned Wayburn's Dancing Daisies accompanying Louise Mink. The "Daisies" are beautiful young girl who dance like fairies and sing like larks and Miss Mink is a very handsome, talented and versatile artist who never fails to conquest her audiences. Frank Byron and Louise Langdon will make a strong bid for popular favor in a skit called "The Dude Detective, which Eastern critics pronounce the most absurdly funny act in vaudeville. Says ye press agent: "It is a twenty-minute joke with a laugh every time the watch ticks." Quigg, Mackey and Nickerson call their performance "Comedy and Harmony." All three artists have a large number of musical instruments at their command and are also witty and original comedians. The Flood brothers, also three in number, comedy acrobats, are among the new comers. It will be the last week of Claire Beasy's performing cats and also of Dorothy Kenton, the Three Dancing Mitchells and Lee Harrison and his humorous stories. New Motion Pictures will be an interesting feature of the entertainment.

Oakland Attractions

Alfred Cellier's masterpiece, "Dorothy," is the musical gem now in preparation for a setting at Idora Park. Meanwhile Victor Herbert's "The Serenade" is delighting the patrons of this popular resort, at which, by the way, many residents of this city find entertainment both in the skating rink and in the theatre. The Oakland Orchestral Concerts under the direction of Paul Steindorff are contributing in no small measure to the pleasure of music lovers across the bay. Popular programmes will be rendered Wednesday afternoons at Ye Liberty Playhouse. The first on March 13 will be for the benefit of Fabiola Hospital.

A BOHEMIAN

I'm like that solemn bird, the Owl,
My sleep by day I take,
That I may through the hours of night
Keep very wide awake.

I like the mystery of dark,
Yet feel that strange delight
That comes with pulling down the shades
And turning up the light.

Yea, I have something of the Owl!
But this I must confess:
The wisdom of the feathered One
Crowns not my owlishness.

THE SUNDAY CALL'S QUEST OF CALIFORNIA BEAUTY.

The "Beauty Editor" of the Sunday Call is laboring in a commendable cause. He is undertaking the task of proving to the world that a Chicago stenographer is not the most beautiful woman in America, and only because there are several women in California who can "give her cards and spades" and win.

In this way the controversy arose: A New York millionaire showed the picture of his sister, an admitted New York beauty, to a young Chicagoan, jealous of the reputation of his townswomen. The pork-packing gamester wagered $50,000 that Chicago could produce a more lovely creature of the fair sex. Then he spent $25,000 in advertising to find the girl who would fill the ideal. The Chicago Tribune footed the bill for the privilege of printing the story and the pictures. When the beauty was found she proved to be a stenographer, earning $12 a week and the Tribune, in its joy and haste, proclaimed her as the most beautiful woman in America.

The Sunday Call had no objections to the Chicago stenographer wearing her crown as queen of beauty over some 6,000 contestants in the lake region, but when her jurisdiction was extended over all of America California had a right to be heard, and the Call sounded the challenge. The Tribune was chivalrous enough in the defense of its particular beauty to accept the defy and is now waiting for the Call to prove that California has a more beautiful woman. Everybody seems bent upon helping the Call. The beauty editor is being swamped with pictures of feminine loveliness. A few of the best of them are going to be published from week to week and the collection ought to make a rare gallery for a bachelor's apartment, or an artistic maiden's boudoir. It seems certain that the call for beauty will be responded to from one end of the state to the other, and if that response does not produce some rare type of feature, or character, the prognostications of beauty experts will all go awry. Artists, literary men and women, and ordinary globe trotters who gave pause by the Golden Gate, have commented upon the number of our beautiful women. The Sunday Call will probably see the pictures of most of these bewitching creatures, and will then pass them on to the jury of experts. When the judgment is rendered, there will be one to wear the laurel of fame, and doubtless a hundred more pressing close for the honor. The Call has provided prizes for those that stand highest in the jury's estimation. The first will receive $150 in gold; the second $50; the third $25 and the next twenty-five $10 each.

poetry that does not deal with the obvious or appeal to moods that are common to the human species. It lacks the universality of old-fashioned art. But one may cultivate a taste for it without incapacitating oneself from enjoyment of the simple rhymes of Longfellow which sometimes sound the keynote that makes the heart throb in unison. We should not lose sight of the fact that there are two kinds of poets—the distinctive who is enjoyed only by those that can claim temperamental kinship, and the popular poet who appeals to no abnormality of taste but charms by his music or by his noble or ethical sentiments. To complain of Longfellow on the score of his religious tendencies is to indicate a very narrow conception of the province of poetry. There was a time when the spirit of all poetry and the spirit of religion reciprocally warmed each other. To express sentiments of religion was one of the first objects of poetry. And because Longfellow's verse is deficient in elaborate thought it does not follow that it is not poetry. It is a mistake to think that a poet never deals in commonplace sentiments. It requires true poetic genius to etherealize the commonplace. It is none the less poetry because it leads us through the familiar fields of asphodel, refreshes us with the cooling breezes or delicious fruits and soothes us with the murmur of waters or the melody of birds. That poetry gives us the greatest pleasure which affects us most and we are most affected by that which deals with matters in which we have the deepest concern. That is not necessarily the highest quality of poetry which deals with the abstruse or the unusual. As some one has said it is not a poet but a brain specialist who tries to uncover new emotions.

number of germs that have been eaten by the white blood corpuscles. Let us suppose that the microscope shows that each white corpuscle of the patient has eaten about 8.5 germs per cell. Then a like examination is made with the blood from a healthy person and the count shows that in this instance 9.5 germs are eaten by each cell. Comparing the results which would be as follows, gives what is known as the opsonic index:

Normal blood (serum).....	9.5
Patient's serum .....	8.5
Patient's opsonic index .....	8.5—0.89

Let us briefly determine the practical value of the opsonic index. While the Jennerian discovery is strictly limited to smallpox, the opsonic index is universally applicable in all infectious diseases. Many infections are local and do not become systematic because germs find it difficult to live in blood owing to the presence in the latter of the normal blood antiseptics. Now we can increase the opsonic power of the blood if we artificially inoculate a person with a definite dose of dead germs which is absolutely innocuous and which is called a vaccine. Take an affection like a common boil: how would we treat it according to the principle of the opsonic index? After having prepared a vaccine from its germs, we next examine the patient's blood and find the index to be 0.8 as compared with the normal 1. The patient is deficient in opsonins and if we inoculate him with his own vaccine, we give the necessary fillip to his production of protective substances in the blood and the local condition will improve. If we found however that his index was 1.2 in comparison with the normal 1, we would know that he had a sufficiency of protective substances in his blood and that the disease would effect its own cure. Take a systemic infection like tuberculosis where the progress of the disease is interrupted by fever and other disturbances: here the patient inoculates himself with his own virus and instead of his opsonic index being constant, it shows considerable oscillations. The treatment then of this disease is to maintain the constancy of the opsonic index and to increase it if possible as a means of antagonizing the disease. From the foregoing we learn that the body is constantly doing battle with the germs of disease; that our normal secretions destroy them, our glands filter them and our cells eat them. That when nature is not abused, the healthy body is capable of resisting disease for the further a physician and the patient drift from nature the more difficult it is to cure. Everything that promotes the general health promotes recovery from the particular disease. The basis of pathology is physiology and treatment is only founded on the simple laws of hygiene.

Professor Spinney's Philosophy

New Thought literature grows apace, though in truth there is nothing especially new, nor over thoughtful in much of the philosophy. "Health through Self-Control in Thinking, Breathing, Eating," the lectures delivered by William Anthony Spinney, is one of the latest additions to this field. Diaphragmatic breathing is the particular fad which Professor Spinney affects, the same which Ella Wheeler Wilcox is so anxious to see added to the educational endless chain. Correct, diaphragmatic, breathing is the cure of all the ills of flesh and spirit. If one had nothing else to do, it would be interesting to test some of the theories, but, unfortunately, most of us are obliged to follow some occupation in order to provide ourselves with the wherewithal to maintain existence. For example, there is the story of the ex-soldier who became a peddler or agent, and whose life was made miserable by the barking of dogs, not to mention their threats of biting. He studied and mastered the theory of mental and physical poise through correct breathing, and thereafter the dogs were his delighted friends. His eyesight improved, his hair resumed its natural color and he became in every way younger. There was a boy of good family who developed a tendency to be impertinent to his mother. His ambition was to lead in athletics, and as soon as he learned that by acting more thoughtfully towards his mother he could compass all he desired, the modest wish to become strong, a good football player, baseball, tennis, golf player, a fine swimmer, rapid runner, to be at the head of his high school class, to study and practice law and live a long and happy life with comfortable surroundings,—he began the style of breathing recommended and speedily accomplished all the rest. The chapter on "Inhibition" is decidedly far-fetched, for it is assumed that the very words sad, sorrow, grief, trouble, sick, failure, and others of their kind induce the conditions which they describe. We all admit the uselessness of dwelling on gloomy thoughts and crying over spilled milk, but, on the other hand, we know perfectly well that Mrs. General's injunction to Little Dorrit not to speak of things did not eliminate the facts. Providence is assumed to be an earthly paradise because the name of the town is backed up by the names of its streets, Tombstone, Eden, Plenty, Joy, etc., and it is assumed that Lombstone, Cripple Creek, Ashville, Waterloo, must exert a depressing influence, and yet, Tombstone received its name for anything but funereal reasons. The story goes that when Ed. Schiffelein started on his desert prospecting trip in which he discovered the famous mines, some of his friends did their best to dissuade him, the parting words of one being, "You won't find anything but your tombstone." The instances of extreme sensitiveness which are held up for the warning and admonition of wickedly heartless teachers and parents who tell children that they should be ashamed of their actions, and thus cause them to breathe less than half enough oxygen are rather amusing. Such extremely delicate blossoms hardly belong to this wicked world, and the noted architect who could never in all his life look upon a finished building without tearful eyes because his father, having tripped over one of his block structures in his childhood, reprimanded him for his ill-chosen building site, must have been quite a lion of ladies' clubdom. The lady who attributed her indigestion to her having witnessed a performance of "Everyman" probably forgot her after-theatre supper. Perhaps we do all eat too much and too often, but the fact remains that the average man wants meat, and people who have labor to perform need breakfast. The man who begins to shovel sand or pile bricks at seven o'clock in the morning and keeps it up till five at night needs a different diet from the club man or the society woman who awakens at eleven, and is spared the exertion of making a toilet, who takes but little exercise, and retires late. It is possible to reduce the amount of food to a very small minimum, if one emulates the hibernating bear. In fact, making theories is a different matter from living up to them. Most people have to make the best of things as they find them. There are some who are never happy unless they are enjoying misery, and worrying the lives out of everyone around them. It needs more than a system of breathing to cure them. Nothing short of being born again can change them, and if they happen to be our parents or employers, it is not always such a simple matter to change our atmosphere. Moreover, all this meddling with our "educational system" in the interests of the children has just the opposite effect on them from what is desired. What children want today more than anything else is judicious letting alone. They ought to be permitted to forget themselves, and decidedly the adult population deserves a rest. It is one thing to neglect children, but it is quite another to keep up this fussy guardianship over every act, voluntary and involuntary. Professor Spinney has some excellent common sense ideas but, as a famous judge once took occasion to remind an over-officious attorney, "The court may be presumed to know something." Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

London's Short Stories

The eight short stories comprised in Jack London's volume entitled "Moon Face" after the initial one of the octette, are in somewhat different vein from those formerly put forth. Most of these have appeared from time to time in various periodicals, and are therefore more or less familiar to readers. The amount of discussion which has gone on over "Moon Face" would prove sufficient of an advertisement to introduce a new writer to a large clientele, the arguments extending from a question as to whether Mr. London or Frank Norris or somebody else first hit on the unusual plot, to the explosive force of a stick of dynamite, while one astute British critic, missing the mark entirely, wonder why any one should feel prejudiced against the name Claverhouse, even admitting him to be so ignorant as to pronounce it as spelled. "Local Color" and "Amateur Night" are newspaper stories which may claim to be of universal interest in these days when everyone aspires to become a newspaper attache of some sort. "The Minions of Midas" has a socialistic touch, while "All Gold Canon" will please most readers of the type who think an author should adopt the course of conduct in his work which is embodied in the injunction to shoemakers to "stick to the last." It is the only one which concerns itself with mining, and relates the adventure of a solitary man who, having found and proved a claim of unusual richness, was attacked by someone who followed him on his quest and struck him down just at the culmination of his efforts. Two of the other stories are what the author himself terms "Tales of Terror," and they are creepy enough to satisfy the most exacting. For so prolific a writer, Mr. London is remarkably successful in keeping up the quality of his work. "Moon Face" is the fifteenth volume, and he has now current in Everybody's another story, besides the work which he has contracted for in connection with his coming voyage. "Moon Face," like most of his other books, is published by the Macmillan Company.

The Annals of Pickeye.

"Then here goes, straight up on the ace."

Card after card was drawn from the box without an ace appearing. The prolonged suspense was beginning to try the nerves of even the veterans when at last a card came out and the ace of spades "lay in the door."

"Arkansaw wins!" came in a general breath.

The dealer handed over several purses of gold dust and some coin, locked up his outfit in the empty drawer, and announced:

"The bank's broke, boys. No more game tonight."

Arkansaw proceeded to stow away his winnings in his pockets. Seeing the Indian, he ordered him to go home and make up a roaring fire. Then he approached the bar, calling out:

"Come up, boys, all of you. I've got to be off to the range at daylight, and must turn in early; but I'll set 'em up for you. Some whisky for me, Cap; and remember that everything is to go, as often and as long as the boys want it. Here's to you all. No hard feelings, I hope, Doc—why, where's Doc Greer?"

"He went out as soon as he locked up," replied someone.

"Well, here's to the rest of you, then. So long." And he emptied his glass, buttoned his blanket-overcoat and left the saloon.

All purpose seemed to fade out with the closing of the faro game and the departure of Arkansaw. Card playing was abandoned, conversation flagged, the crowd appeared indisposed even to avail itself of the freedom of the bar.

At length someone proposed that Cap Ryan should give a ball. The suggestion took like wildfire. Ryan assented, the musicians volunteered their services, and then came the question of ladies.

It was a more difficult one than might be inferred from their limited number. If all the women in Pickeye could have been invited the men would have outnumbered them ten to one; but it was impossible to arrange matters even on this disproportionate basis, for most of them were outside the pale of social recognition. The Grimshaw family alone was strictly irreproachable, but unfortunately it was not numerous in proportion to its respectability. The female part of it consisted of Mrs. Grimshaw, her daughter Cosey, and Clara Dascomb, a young lady who had recently come to reside with them. Another lady would be required to make up even a single set, and who that other should be was the perplexing problem.

"Bring in almost any of them," said J-B. "It'll be only one to three, and everything goes on the Slope, anyhow."

"No, that won't do," objected Cape Ann; "we've got to discriminate. Now, there's Dolly Jewett; she's the decentest of the lot. Barring her general reputation, she'd be all right!"

"That's no better than J-B's plan," interposed Dobie Joe. "Let's send up to the rancheria and invite one of the squaws. They may not be immaculate, but they are in good standing with their tribe, and that's the final test of a woman's character. Do you think your folks will stand in on a lay-out of that kind, Pap?"

"I reckon so," replied Grimshaw. "They're spoiling for almost anything that promises variety."

The plan was adopted. Dobie Joe was sent to the rancheria for the squaw, and Forey Grayson, who had just re-entered the room, and Tom Thorpe were detailed to aid Pap Grimshaw in securing the attendance of the other ladies.

By the time the room was put in order and the men had furbished up as they could to improve their appearance, Dobie Joe reappeared, accompanied by a pretty Indian girl, an old tar-faced squaw and two bucks. The maiden was unkempt and barefooted, but in her gay calico gown, with her bright eyes and perfect teeth, she would not have been a wallflower in a selecter company.

"Gentlemen," said Dobie Joe, "this is Miss Susan, a lady under my special protection. For the occasion you owe it to her and to yourselves to treat her with as much courtesy as if she were a princess—which she may be, for aught I know."

There was a general bowing and uncovering to Susan, which might have become embarrassing to her had not the Grimshaw party arrived just then. It was a comely group for a frontier settlement—Mrs. Grimshaw, pleasant and matronly; Cosey, pretty and piquant; Clara Dascomb, stately and demure.

So many acquaintances pressed forward to pay their respects that the affair was settling into a mere reception when Dobie Joe called out, "Choose partners for a cotillion," and led Susan to the center of the floor. Thorpe and Clara, Grayson and Cosey, followed. Grimshaw offered his arm to his wife, but, looking at the crowd of men without partners, she said, "It doesn't seem fair, Pap," and declined it to accept the proffer of Cape Ann.

At the same time "stag" sets were formed. Big bewhiskered men had handkerchiefs bound around their arms to denote that they represented the gentler sex. Then the music struck up, and the beauty and manhood of Piekeye joined in the revelry of its first grand ball.

How long the festivity might have lasted in the ordinary course of events will never be known, for it had scarce begun before it came to an abrupt end. The street door was suddenly thrown open and half a dozen men rushed in, led by Brackett, the express-rider, who demanded:

"Is Forey Grayson here?"

"What do you want of me?" asked Grayson, stepping forward.

"You've murdered and robbed Arkansaw. I arrest you."

"It's a lie, whoever says it!" exclaimed Cosey, rushing to Grayson's side. "Why don't you say so, Forey? Why don't you fight?"

"Be quiet, Cosey," was Grayson's only remark, as he submitted to being disarmed and led away.

The next day was the Sabbath, but no one in Piekeye thought of keeping it holy. It had been decided to try Grayson by Lynch law. There were regularly constituted courts in the town, but the people scorned their slow and doubtful processes. By early afternoon all the arrangements were complete. They could have been made sooner, but it was felt that haste would be unseemly in so grave an affair.

The court was the customary popular tribunal of Piekeye—Chancellor Kent, judge; General Houston, prosecuting attorney, and Cape Ann, clerk. An exception was that Doc Greer, the gambler, had managed to get himself appointed as sheriff for the people. It convened in the Long Tom saloon, as usual. The prisoner was brought in, a jury impaneled, and the trial begun.

The first witness was Brackett, the express-rider. He testified that after taking care of his horse the previous evening he started for his home, which was between Arkansaw's and Grimshaw's. When some distance from the former he heard a pistol shot, and, upon approaching the spot, saw a man dodge into the brush. He hid himself and waited for the man to come out. Presently he saw him emerge, look cautiously about and hurry toward town. The man was Forey Grayson. Witness proceeded home. In about an hour Indian Jim came running to his cabin and told him that Arkansaw had been killed. Witness went with Jim and found the body lying at the very spot where he had seen Grayson acting so strangely. Satisfied that he was the murderer, witness had summoned help and arrested him.

Asked if he had examined the locality by daylight, witness said he had, and that tracks corresponding with those made by Grayson's boots were plainly to be seen, and that hanging to a clump of bluebrush, but three feet from where the body lay, was a scarf which belonged to the prisoner.

The scarf was produced. Its exhibition created a sensation, for everyone recognized the gaudy thing.

Witness further stated that when he arrested Grayson he had taken a revolver from him, one chamber of which was empty, and that from the freshness of the powder-stain it was evident it had been discharged but recently.

Tom Thorpe, who represented Grayson, said he had no questions to ask.

Indian Jim was called next. Asked if he understood the nature of an oath, his response was:

"Eat um? Drink um?"

"No; swear um," said General Houston, holding up his hand as if taking an oath.

"Oh, me savee. Injun heap savee Goddlemighty. No lie, good; heap lie, devil catch um."

"Essentially correct," assented General Houston. "Now tell all you know about kill um Arkansaw."

"Me go cabin. Make big fire. Wait um. Arkansaw no come. Somebody shoot. Mebbe Arkansaw pretty drunk; mebbe somebody shoot coyote—me dun know. Wait um more; heap wait um. Arkansaw heap no come. Bymeby me go look see. Find um Arkansaw heap killed. Shoot um dead. Me dun know who. Mebbe him (pointing to Grayson); me think no."

The only question on cross-examination was why the witness did not think the prisoner guilty, to which he answered:

"He Arkansaw's heap good friend."

Nothing additional was brought out by the succeeding witnesses for the prosecution, their testimony merely corroborating that of Brackett as to the footprints and the finding of the scarf.

For the defense, Grayson himself was called first. Asked what he knew about the killing of Arkansaw, he said he knew nothing except what he had heard.

"Please explain to the court and jury your presence and actions near the scene of the tragedy," said Thorpe.

"Just after the express arrived I strolled up the trail in that direction. While returning, when near Mr. Grimshaw's, I heard a shot fired. Proceeding cautiously along, I saw a man ahead of me, and thinking he might be some lawless character, I stepped into the chaparral to let him pass. After waiting a while, not hearing his footsteps any longer, I regained the trail and walked rapidly to town."

"When was the chamber of your revolver discharged?"

"I fired it yesterday, at a ground-squirrel."

Under cross-examination, Grayson said he did not go very far from town the previous evening.

"Were you walking all the while you were absent?"

"Not all the while."

"What were you doing when not walking?"

"I don't see any bearing that can have on the case."

"It might have a very material one, if you were lying in wait for your victim. I repeat the question, what were you doing when not walking?"

"I decline to tell."

"Very well, sir," said General Houston, glancing significantly at the jury; "I am satisfied with the answer, if you are."

Pap Grimshaw was next called. He identified a bullet he had assisted in extracting from the body of Arkansaw. Asked if he could demonstrate that the exhibit had an important bearing on the case, he replied that he could.

"I have here a pair of gold-scales," he continued, taking from a case a delicate balance and some weights. "I have also a new and perfect 44-caliber ball, which fits what is called the dragoon-size Colt's revolver. It weighs, as you all can see, five pennyweights and twenty grains. The bullet I now substitute in its place is the one extracted from Arkansaw's body. It weighs exactly the same, you see, and consequently must belong to a dragoon-size bore. Now, the pistol taken from the prisoner, and in evidence here, is the navy size. It is a 38-caliber, and the balls weigh, as you will see by this test, but three pennyweights and ten grains—more than a third less than the dragoon size. It is impossible, therefore, that the bullet which killed Arkansaw could have been fired from the defendant's pistol."

The demonstration was conclusive. A sense of relief was manifested by the audience, which was shared by the judge and jury and even the prosecuting attorney apparently.

"Let me see the exhibit," said General Houston.

He took the bullet and looked at it with simple curiosity at first. But as he turned it in his fingers he suddenly became interested and scrutinized it closely, his placid expression giving place to one of professional triumph.

"This piece of lead is of a peculiar shape," he said gravely. "I doubt if it was ever a ball. I think it was what is called a slug, and that the battering it has undergone has transformed it into something like a bullet. Has anyone a slug for a navy revolver?"

"There are plenty of them behind the bar," said Cap Ryan.

"Will you please get one and let the witness ascertain its weight?"

Cap Ryan procured a slug and handed it to Grimshaw, who placed it in the scales. As he adjusted the weights his face grew pale.

"It weighs five pennyweights and twenty grains, exactly the same as a dragoon-size ball."

The announcement came like a shock. No one spoke. The battered piece of lead was passed to the jurymen, who examined it one after another. By the expression of their faces it was evident they coincided with General Houston's opinion.

"They are going to convict him; I can see it in their looks," whispered Clara Dascomb to Thorpe.

"I fear so; but what can be done?"

"The defense will go on with its case," said the judge.

"We have no more witnesses," announced Thorpe.

"Then, if ready, counsel will proceed with their arguments."

"May it please the court," said General Houston, to the astonishment of everybody, "I feel that it will be no dereliction of duty on my part to let the case go to the jury without argument."

"And I, your Honor," said Thorpe, "can say nothing that could add to the strength of the defendant's straightforward statement or weight to the proof of the bullet; for, though there may be a doubt respecting the bullet, that very doubt must be construed in the defendant's favor."

"Then, gentlemen of the jury,"—

"Your Honor," interrupted Clara.

"Miss Dascomb!"

"If I may speak, I can throw light upon this sad affair, at least so far as the prisoner is concerned."

"Clara!" admonished Grayson, sternly.

"I will speak; don't try to prevent me."

"We are trying to get at the truth," said the judge. "If you can assist us, Miss Dascomb, by all means do so."

"The prisoner's refusal to account for his whereabouts is prompted solely by a fear of compromising me. He shall not go to certain death when a word from me can save him."

"Do you know where he was?" asked Thorpe eagerly.

"Yes, he was with me in my bedroom at Mr. Grimshaw's."

"My God, Clara, don't say it!" groaned Thorpe.

"I swear it! He was just leaving me when the shot was fired. We heard it distinctly. I urged him to remain, but he insisted on going, and this is the unhappy consequence."

"I submit to the court and jury," said General Houston, "that predisposed as we may be to respect this young lady and her sex generally, her confession is too shameless to be entitled to credence."

"There is no shame, gentlemen," cried Clara, goaded to desperation. "This man is my brother, Charles Dascomb."

"Charles Dascomb!" exclaimed General Houston; "the suspect wanted by the Yuba county authorities for murder!"

"The charge is false!" asserted Clara, proudly. Then the ardor which had sustained her gave way, and throwing herself in the prisoner's arms she sobbed, "Oh, Charlie, Charlie, what have I done? Forgive me!"

Grayson tried to soothe the excited girl, while the crowd craned forward to get a sight of them. When the confusion had subsided a little, General Houston said:

"I beg to withdraw the remark I made just now respecting this unfortunate young lady. But, your Honor, from either point of view her bias is too self-evident for her statement to be received as valid testimony."

"As Miss Dascomb was not under oath," said the judge, "her statement is not properly before the jury, and they will not consider it in arriving at a verdict."

"I ask, your Honor, that Miss Dascomb be sworn," said Thorpe.

"I forbid it!" came savagely from Grayson. "She has undergone too much already."

"Very well," said the judge. Then turning to the jurors, "Gentlemen of the jury, I shall make no charge to you. You will retire and agree upon a verdict."

The jury filed off into a back room and the pent-up feelings of the spectators broke out into earnest discussion, unchecked by the court. As the minutes passed, however, the talk gradually ceased, and at the end of a half-hour there was a profound stillness. Then the door of the back room opened and the jurymen returned to their places.

"Have you agreed upon a verdict?" asked the judge.

"We have, your Honor," replied the foreman, handing him a folded paper.

"The clerk will read it," said the judge.

"Guilty, as charged," read Cape Ann.

Clara uttered a scream and fell to the floor insensible. Mrs. Grimshaw tried to revive her, but Grayson said:

"Don't restore her yet. Wait till it is all over."

The jury was polled. After the last affirmative response had been made Chancellor Kent hesitated a long while. At last, with a death-like face and a hollow voice, he said:

"The prisoner will please stand up."

Grayson arose.

"Forey Grayson, a jury of your countrymen has rendered against you a verdict of guilty of the crime of murder, which carries with it capital punishment. Have you anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon you?"

"Nothing, except that I am innocent of the crime," replied Grayson calmly.

"That point has been decided by the jury, to pass sentence is the painful duty that devolves upon me. Forey Grayson, in accordance with the verdict of the jury and the invariable usage of tribunals of this kind, it is the sentence of the court that at the expiration of one hour from now you be taken hence and hanged by the neck until you are dead. And may God have mercy on your soul."

The condemned was removed to a back room. The allotted hour was devoted by him to solacing his sister. Mrs. Grimshaw remained with them, but to the surprise of everybody after one violent burst of indignation at the court and jury and one passionate embrace of Clara, Cosey deserted them.

While the sad little party and two deputies of Doc Greer were waiting, Indian Jim came shuffling into the room and approached Grayson, saying:

"You kill um Arkansaw, no?"

"No, Jim."

"Who kill um?"

"I don't know, Jim; but you watch Doc Greer; maybe you find out."

"Me heap savee. Me watch um."

And Indian Jim turned and walked slouchingly away.

Grayson was to be hanged from the limb of an oak at the outskirt of the town. He was to be made to stand on the back of a horse until the noose had been adjusted, when the animal was to be led from under him. A rope was secured to a limb, the noose dangling at what was thought to be the requisite height, then a saddled horse was brought to the spot, and the preparations were complete.

A great deal of talk went on among the crowd meanwhile. There were many expressions of sympathy but no one questioned the justness of the verdict or sentence. The average feeling was voiced by Dobie Joe.

"I never thought Forey a bad sort of fellow," said he. "In fact, I always liked him. But that's the worst of it in this cussed country, you can't tell whether a man is a saint or a cutthroat until his hand is shown down. Poor devil, I'm sorry for him!"

When the hour was up, Grayson, with his arms bound behind him, was brought out by Doc Greer and his deputies. The trace of tears he could not wipe away after parting with his sister were on his cheeks, but his bearing was erect and fearless. The procession moved forward in silence to the place of execution. Grayson was lifted into the saddle, but before he could be ordered to stand upright somebody shouted:

"The rope's too short; it'll have to be let down."

The fact was too obvious to be questioned. The noose was at least six feet above Grayson's head.

"You lubber!" exclaimed Doc Greer to a man outstretched on a lower branch, ready to adjust the noose; "I told you to make it longer. Stay where you are; I'll let it down myself," and he swung himself into the tree and climbed toward the limb to which the rope was fastened.

Just then there was a parting of the crowd as Cosey forced her way through it.

"I wish to speak to him—just one word," she panted as she reached Grayson's side.

In deference to her request the guards moved a few steps away. A look of surprise and pleasure lighted up Grayson's features as he bent down to meet Cosey's uplifted face. What she said to him in a rapid whisper was inaudible to everybody else, but he smiled and nodded, and then, quick as thought, she freed his hands by one slash of a knife and the next instant drove the point of it into the horse's flank, crying:

"Ride for your life, Forey; don't think about me!"

Grayson gathered the reins with the first spring of the frantic horse, and before the crowd could realize what had happened he had cloven through it and was speeding up the mountain trail.

Doc Greer came sliding down from the tree and fiercely upbraided Cosey, who stood defiant and unflinching in the center of the excited crowd.

"You little devil!" stormed he, brandishing a pistol about her head, "I've a notion to gibbet you in his place!"

"Just try it, and there'll be a villain less in the world," was Cosey's quiet reply.

"Don't ruffle a hair of her head, Doc Greer, unless you're aching to see a lot of us turn loose," said Dobie Joe, springing to Cosey's side. "I guess she's done only what's right. Anyhow, I'll back her. For if ever I stand with my neck in a noose it's a gal just like her I shall wish for. Them's my sentiments."

And they appeared to be the sentiments of the majority of the crowd also, for so many rallied around Cosey with assurances of approval and support that her return to town was in the nature of a triumph.

The day drew to an end, but Pickeye's discussion of its events promised to be endless. Only one person came to a definite conclusion. That was Clara Dascumb. She resolved not to stay another night in Pick-eye. She would go, and go afoot and alone. Her insistence convinced her friends that she expected to meet her brother somewhere, so they assented—but Pap Grimshaw and Cosey were to follow her secretly.

Her purpose became so generally known that nearly everybody drifted, as if by chance, to the lower end of the main street, whence a foot bridge, suspended from two hawsers, spanned the river. Just at sunset Clara came down the street, accompanied by Mrs. Grimshaw and Cosey. She bade the former good-bye at the river edge, but Cosey insisted on going to the other side with her.

The foot bridge swayed so that they had to grasp one of the hawsers to steady themselves. They had reached the middle of the stream when the rope to which they were clinging suddenly gave way, letting the walk drop and throwing them into the river. Luckily they retained their hold on the rope, and by grasping it with both hands were able to resist the force of the current.

Pianos repaired, tuned, moved and stored

The terrified spectators saw only the imperiled girls at first, but when they turned their eyes to the big oak from which the hawsers were stretched, they beheld Doc Greer in the act of cutting the remaining cable.

A cry of horror and rage burst from the onlookers as they rushed toward the spot. Their interposition would have come too late, but a quicker one was at hand. Before Greer had cut a single strand Indian Jim sprang upon him and plunged a huge knife its full length into his neck. Greer turned savagely, but the blow had been too sure. His uplifted hand dropped, and he reeled and fell.

As the people looked again toward the endangered girls they saw them still clinging to the rope, but they now saw something more. Tom Thorpe was advancing rapidly to their rescue from the town side and from the opposite bank was coming Forey Grayson.

When those who had rushed to intercept Doc Greer reached him he was almost at his last gasp.

"Are you much hurt, Doc?" inquired Cap Ryan.

"I'm done for. That d——d Injun's got even on me for Arkansaw."

"Did you kill Arkansaw?"

"Yes, and Jut Harrison too. I don't care who knows it now. In five minutes I shall be a dead man."

Meanwhile the rescuers had reached Clara and Cosey and assisted them to gain a foothold on the hanging walk and support themselves by the taut hawser. A great cheer went up from the assemblage on the shore. Grayson stood next to Cosey and Thorpe to Clara. It was evident to the onlookers that they were engaged in earnest debate. Divining that Grayson and Clara refused to return to Pickeye, a remarkable demonstration ensued. Some shouted assurances of welcome, some knelt and lifted their hands in supplication, until Dobie Joe having improvised a white flag and raised it, the whole shore presently became a fluttering mass of white.

This manifestation of truce turned the scale. The little party began to make its way toward the town shore, and ere long all four of them stood safely on the bank.

The demonstration that night was the crowning event in the annals of Pickeye. Cap Ryan inaugurated it.

"Boys," said he, "the deal has come out square all around except for poor old Arkansaw. Let's honor his memory. The Long Tom is wide open and free to everybody to-night."

Couriers were sent out to the adjacent camps, and presently a stream of enthusiastic men came pouring in to swell the crowd. All through the night bonfires blazed, anvils boomed and processions marched and countermarched, with streaming banners and martial music.

At sunrise, when the line for the fiftieth or so time filed past the Grimshaw residence, cheering, and Cosey smiled a merry acknowledgment, Dobie Joe, tottering under a big American flag he had carried all night, waved his hat rapturously and exclaimed:

"You never did a better thing, Cosey, than when you set Forey Grayson free!"

"Except when I brought Charley Dascomb back captive," replied Cosey roughly.

An inspired propheticess could not have spoken truer words. To this day the generations of most of the families in that region run back to Charles and Cosey Dascomb in the one case, and to Thomas and Clara Thorpe in the other.

State Division

The note of elation is so distinct in the noise being made by the promoters of state division sentiment that one might imagine them to be within sight of their goal. But they have hardly got away from the scratch. The process of dividing a state is not one upon which we have any empirical knowledge, and even though all the people of the state should be in favor of acquiring some it is doubtful that the privilege would be accorded. The third section of Article IV of the Constitution provides: "No new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state; nor any state be formed by the junction of two or more states or parts of states, without the consent of the legislatures of the states concerned as well as of the Congress." A proposition to divide a state would excite considerable interest, and in all probability it would meet with stern opposition. No section of this country is in favor of augmenting the political strength of any other section, for in proportion to the increase of power in one section there is decrease of power in every other section. It is hardly probable that New England with its twelve Senators would view with favor a proposition to give the Pacific Coast two more Senators and also to increase our vote in the Electoral College. There is even now a sentiment in New England that considering our benighted state we have too much political power, and that it would be well to subject us to a little drastic discipline, in the interest of our trade with the Orient. But Los Angeles may be able to convert New England to citrus belt sentiment by pointing out that the temperament of the people south of Tehachapi is akin to that of the people of Massachusetts and arguing that whatever power is given to them will naturally be used to render negligible the influence of the vulgar progeny of the hardy but dissolute pioneers. Easily susceptible of proof is the difference in sentiment between the people of Los Angeles and vicinity and those of Northern California, and the circumstance is one that should appeal to the people of New England. This difference is becoming more pronounced every year and as a consequence there is now in this section less aversion than formerly to the proposed division of the state. In the minds of many there is a strong prejudice against yielding up a slice of the state to comparative strangers, but there are others that conceive it to be the part of wisdom to split the state as an expedient for the preservation of Californian individuality. While no old Californian or ardent native son would confess that he had any fear of being assimilated by the Yankees from New England or the new-rich retired country merchants from the Middle West, still it is fatuous to ignore the growing influence in state affairs of the rapidly swelling southern community. It is a community full of aggressive, long-haired individuals who are never happy while there is joy in the world which they might strive to abate, and those of its members who are not afflicted with idiosyncrasies are nevertheless not of the temperament of the people of the north. All are a unit in state affairs affecting the interests of the south, and they are for the south first and the rest of the state afterward. If they do not succeed in dividing the state they will at least come pretty near compelling the acceptance of their ideals. In the contemplation of this prospect many Californians will be inclined to acquiesce in the wishes of the division propagandists.

Our Great Financial Genius

On close inspection Mr. Harriman does not present so forbidding an aspect as at long range. If candor entitles a man to respect then Mr. Harriman is, at least, undeserving of execration. His practices are those peculiar to the American captain of industry in his highest stage of development, and though they are not consistent with the ideals of Christian morality, neither are they at variance with the principles of competition that are sanctified by the best usage in this golden era of the apotheosis of commercial success. Mr. Harriman has done nothing more than improve upon the methods of his contemporaries in the field of frenzied finance, and in doing so it is not improbable that he was convinced of the rectitude of his course. In sound morals the end does not justify the means, but it does in the railroad business, a fact that we learned from Mr. Paul Morton who admitted that he criminally granted rebates in order to save his road from bankruptcy. Mr. Roosevelt was not shocked by that admission. It did not lower Mr. Morton in Mr. Roosevelt's esteem. Of this we were assured when Mr. Roosevelt recommended Mr. Morton for the important position which that gentleman now holds in New York. Mr. Harriman is fully as candid as was Mr. Morton, but so far there has been no testimony to show that he was as contemptuous of the laws of his country as was the President's confidential friend. We do not admire Mr. Harriman despite his great financial genius. Nor yet are we prejudiced against him on account of his methods, for we realize that as laws and their application always savor of their times so does the conduct of men. In estimating the character of men the conscientious historian considers their environment and the temperament of the period in which they lived. Mr. Harriman's views as one of the great figures in the current commercial drama is typical of his time, but he does not inspire to panegyric those of us that have a plenitude of ethical ideals and are barren of the ideas that are essential to commercial success. Quicker than most of us to recognize the elusive symptoms of golden opportunity, Mr. Harriman nevertheless is not blessed with our lively appreciation of the responsibilities of wealth. And this unfortunately appears to be characteristic of the species; the man of wealth is unconscious of the obligations to society that wealth entails, the poor man knows all about them.

The Old Familiar Question

Though we are supposed to be in the midst of an irreligious age there is a vast deal of metaphysical discussion occupying the attention of men. In nearly every newspaper space is occasionally given to bright and entertaining speculation respecting either the essentials of Christianity or the nature of man and his probable destination. The negation philosopher is coming to the front once more and his dialectic prestidigitations have as usual all the charm which attaches to the unfathomable. As in all ages he is in doubt whether to deem himself a god or beast, and with characteristic vehemence devotes himself to reasoning but to err. He belongs to that school of philosophers that analyze and dissect but never build except on negatives. They create doubts not convictions. It is amusing to follow them since they appear to be as proud of negation as though they invented it. Some of them appear to be of the opinion that their reason will finally lead them to truth, and that besides being able to prove that the soul is not indestructible they will be able to determine whether it is round or oblong. The question of the immortality of the soul is one of the great historic battlefields of metaphysics. Disputes over this question have occupied attention in every age from Socrates to Howison, between whom there is a shade of difference; for the Attic philosopher being haunted by the conviction of the unreliability of his senses, maintained that the only thing he knew was that he knew nothing, whereas the sage of Berkeley is fully as cocksure of his syllogisms as was Hegel, whose philosophy, Schopenhauer tells us, was "sufficient to cause an atrophy of the intellect." In the current luxuriance of thought on the subject of the nature of the soul and the destination of man, it is easy to see that there is a revolt at the supernatural, but we have no intention of setting for ourselves that vain task of stemming the shallow stream of scepticism. We recognize it as one of the inevitable phenomena. We have schooled ourselves against the weariness that is superinduced by abstractions. We have read so much of the philosophy that argues the universe a foundling and disputes over its parentage that we have come to regard with the indulgence that is vouchsafed a child all those that look upon life as a nightmare and the world as a phantasm. We only beg leave to inform some of them that they are wasting their time appealing to the Bible as the court of last resort to support their diverse positions. The Bible is not the final authority in spiritual matters. Our knowledge of God does not depend on those perishable things which Moses dashed to the ground nor on things of which the originals were lost, or on anything which came to us mis-written by copyists and tampered with by doctors and susceptible of various interpretations. As Spinoza has said it is incredible that God would commit the treasure of the true record of himself to any substance less enduring than the human heart. The sages of the church have not depended on biblical texts to support the theory of the immortality of the soul. So far as the Bible is concerned they take it as a whole, and argue that a soul merely resultant from the forces of the body as harmony is won from the strings of the lyre is entirely inconsistent with the story of the Redemption. They also argue that immortality is implied by the very fact that morality is the basis of society; for if man were a mere mass of matter there would be neither vice nor virtue; morality would be a sham. Our laws which are ever relative and variable cannot serve as the basis of morals which are absolute and unalterable. They must therefore rest on something more permanent than the present life and have better guarantees than uncertain rewards or transient punishments. We do not present these arguments as conclusive but merely to let some of the learned philosophers of the day know that they are in error in assuming that stray texts from the Scriptures are all that are depended upon to support the theory of the immortality of the soul. It may be well for them to know also, that in assuming that religion was invented to support morals they are taking the effect for the cause. It is the idea of God that suggests morals. And as for their assumption that religion is dying they should reflect that religion was a thing of the past before Christ came. It received the outward semblance of respect which is due to all that is venerable, but faith had faded. Its restoration was undertaken later as a governmental necessity, and the Senate proclaimed the divinity of Augustus. In Diocletian's time deities were denied even the immortality of mummies, and a pantomime was performed entitled "The Last Will and Testament of Defunct Jupiter." Religion is always dying—somewhere.

Nobility News

That habits of thought are totally inconsistent with the systematic reading of newspapers has often been asserted, and in the case of those who read a daily paper, not to learn what is going on but to satisfy the craving for some sort of mental food which exists in all literate people, it is undoubtedly true. But there is one section of the American daily for which no reason of any satisfactory description can be given and to say of those who spend time that might be wisely employed, in the empty business of perusing this part of the paper, that they are worse than uselessly busied is to make an exceedingly mild statement of the case. We refer to the so-called "cable pages" of the Sunday papers wherein the doings of kings and nobles from Copenhagen to Belgrade and from Tunis to Kashmir are set forth by special correspondents with a painstaking attention to intimate detail worthy a better cause. The "cable page" is a growth of recent years, invented by the yellow journalists at a time when they seemed determined that no sort of catering to vulgarity was beyond them. Just what influence has been wrought upon circulation by the knowledge of the fact that not the moneyed nobility of this country only but also the titled nobility of Europe is to be found exhibited for the meanest of the proletariat to feast his mind upon every Sunday morning, is beyond conjecture. Certainly it must have been considerable, otherwise two or three pages would not be devoted week after week to this sort of "news." The value of this "cable news" may be estimated by a casual examination of any Sunday newspaper. Take a paper of last Sunday for instance; note some of its cable features: From London comes the weighty intelligence that the Princess Christian has a bad temper and displayed it recently at a school exhibition; that Lord Roseberry's son is squandering his money at Monte Carlo; that the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury are quarreling over an allowance arrangement; that Mrs. Harold Baring has some ready money and will try to make a showing in society with it; that Waldorf Astor is not popular with his tenants; that an American woman has taken up the fad of politics. From Paris what news? Why, Gladys Vanderbilt is actually taking singing lessons; there is to be no tax on French titles; Paris is to have a cheap opera house; the king of Servia's brother has been sued by a dressmaker. From Madrid comes the epoch making news that chauffeurs must submit to examinations of their fitness. Athens is wrought up because Queen Olga's chambermaid has stolen her diamonds, while from faraway Simla comes the tremendous news that the Amir of Afghanistan gives formal notice before he stoops to crack a joke. These are not extreme examples of the Sunday cable story; they are chosen at random and are quite typical. Not one single item of news in the whole budget, with the exception of the notice of the new opera house at Paris, is of the smallest consequence to any private person in this country. Yet thousands must be devouring these items, otherwise they would not be published. No better proof of the deterioration of public taste in reading or of the actively debasing influence of the yellow newspapers could be adduced. This sort of reading stifles thought and afflicts the reader with a fatty degeneration of the mind from which recovery is extremely difficult.

The Literature Of The Young

An Eastern magazine exults over the quantity and quality of the season's crop of juveniles. It is inconceivable that the writer who thinks there is cause for exultation ever hears an expression of opinion from any of the youngsters into whose hands the books are thrust. Unfortunately the books are reviewed by adults who either have forgotten their childhood and their resentment of platitudes and homilies, or have become obsessed with the delusion that children nowadays are not what they used to be. Educational faddists abominate the Optics, the Algiers and Kelloggs of a past generation, authors whose works were exhausted by boys and girls before their fifteenth year preparatory to the taking up of Scott, Dumas and Elliot, and in these advanced days there are simplified editions of Robinson Crusoe and Treasure Island. Think of its being necessary to move the last mile post forward to induce a boy to read such works! The probability is that the father and mother of the coddled youngster thus coaxed were torn between anxiety to know the end and fear lest the last page should be turned all too soon. Children's books were once few and far between. In the old days children as young as eight or nine habitually read Dickens and Scott and Shakespeare. Of course they did not "understand" everything they read, but parents had sense enough to know there was no danger of innocent minds being tainted with impurities. The long words were not eliminated, nor were plots and incidents juggled, relationships reconstructed and general havoc wrought for the safeguarding of the young person from contamination. Today the young person is guarded every foot of the route and imagines he has read books when he has only read what somebody else has written about them. And he grows up and becomes, perhaps, a twentieth century college student with more vices and, judging of the scandals being ventilated in some part of the country every day, surely not with more honor than was to be found in college life a generation or two ago. Children's books today are beautiful from the manufacturers' point of view. The paper is excellent and so are the illustrations as a rule, while the typographical features and the bindings are such as kings could not have commanded a century ago, but right there the merits come to an end. There is more educational value in smooth blocks of wood. In the matter of books, children are mightily abused. The fussy supervision which is lavished on them is quite as deleterious as the eternal vigilance of the child-studyist in other matters.

An Attack on Morality.

If our newspapers took any interest in studying the trend of public opinion in those of its manifestations which are not entirely concrete and obvious or if they were concerned with those more delicate shades of wrongdoing which do not lend themselves to the purposes of heavy "display type," they would have something to say, editorially at least, of an assault on morality as bold as it was unprovoked which was made in the State Senate last week. But the newspapermen at Sacramento are too busily engaged tracking the footprints of the Southern Pacific Railroad across the hundreds on hundreds of bills and resolutions that are receiving the hurried consideration of the state solons in the closing days of the session to bother about a mere matter of ethics, especially as the bold assault on morals was unsuccessful. Nevertheless it ought to be recorded, for the benefit of those who are more interested in ethics than politics and who see graver dangers for the state in the loosening of moral ties than in the concession of valuable franchises to favored corporations, that a serious effort was made in the Legislature to blot out the provisions in our law that postpone the granting of a final decree of divorce for one year after the interlocutory decree has been entered.

The Laws Objectionable Features.

Particular significance attaches to this attempt because it was made by none other than the chairman of the committee on public morals! This worthy who was entrusted at the beginning of the session with the responsible care of all measures affecting public and private decency in so far as moral conduct is concerned, is Senator Irish of Downieville and San Francisco. That he has zealously discharged the duties of his position in all other matters excepting this of divorce may be doubted. But let Senator Irish of Downieville be judged solely in his capacity of watchdog over public morality, by his distinguished advocacy of a return to the old system by which the superior judges of this state were empowered to part the chafing matrimonial band at one stroke and were enabled to dismiss the mismatched couple with the cheering injunction—"Go and try once more without loss of precious time." Exactly what popular demand or private consideration prompted the chairman of the committee on public morals to ask the Senate to undo the work of several years and of innumerable strenuous endeavors, particularly at a time when some of the most concentrated thinkers in the fields of ethics and theology are exerting themselves to their utmost to correct the evil of this country's disgracefully lax and hopelessly contradictory divorce laws by strict and uniform enactments, it is utterly impossible to say. It is conceivable that some unworthy members of the legal profession may have fault to find with a law which probably in many instances postpones the collection of their fees for one year after their valuable services are given and as the Downieville senator is an attorney in addition to being the custodian of the state's morals, their complaints may have found a sympathetic hearing. It is also conceivable that Irish is appalled at the tremendous cruelty and hardship sponsored by the state law which compels a divorced person to wait twelve interminable months before treading again the pathway of lawful alliance. In fact it was this latter argument which Senator Irish advanced when he arose to explain and defend his bill against the assaults of legislators whose old-fashioned notions of the sanctity of marriage led them, some of them, to make the revolutionary statement that they do not believe in divorce at all. The conditions following the granting of interlocutory decrees of divorce, according to Senator Irish, are a fruitful cause of scandal and the whole system is unnecessarily Draconian in its severity. This tender regard for the morals of a state exposed to the scandalizing influence of men and women who violate the interlocutory decree places Irish almost on the exalted plane of Johnsonian morality, but consideration of the remedy proposed for this shocking condition dashes the incipient idol from its shrine and leads to the conviction that its feet are of the veriest clay. Irish, by what devious mental process none may know, has reached the conclusion in which is summed up all the most fallacious part of Oscar Wilde's philosophy—"The best way to overcome temptation is to yield to it." That a majority in the Senate refused to so change the law as to make a trip to Reno unnecessary is certainly to their credit, but the student of present tendencies in morals will be grieved to learn that sixteen votes were cast in favor of Irish's bill while only twenty senators registered their protest against it.

Perspective Impressions

Is the confiscation of the Spring Valley Water property a scheme to saddle upon the city the responsibility of paying exorbitantly for what it took unlawfully?

The riot started by some proud Celts in a local playhouse the other night was not an expression of resentment as the reporters imagined. It was a contribution to the humor of an otherwise deadly dull performance.

A member of the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce, who is obviously a taxpayer, objects to the removal of the capital to Berkeley because as Berkeley faces the Golden Gate it will always be a tempting target to hostile war vessels. This is an objection that will carry considerable weight—in Sacramento.

The Bar Association of San Francisco, whose members are zealous for the preservation of the honor and dignity of the legal profession, should begin proceedings for the disbarment of Francis J. Heney for saying that one of our judges has frequently been drunk on duty. By this statement Mr. Heney implies that the Bar Association would tolerate a drunken judge.

What a lot of fun Abe Ruef is having with the poor, misguided individuals intent upon the preposterous achievement of vindicating justice in San Francisco!

"The community is closely watching the tactics of the Board of Supervisors," says the Chronicle. Quite true, but what good does it do to watch. When the community makes up its mind to ride the supervisors on a rail then there will be something worth talking about.

If this capital removal proposal ever gets to the people the writer hereof is no prophet. It will stop justly short of that eventuality. Governor Gillett will veto the bill and it will not pass over the Governor's veto in the assembly. Make a note of this.—Sacramento Union. We did.

The Wall street bosses are reported to have precipitated a panic to show their indignation at the President's interference with their frenzied financiering and "to teach the public a lesson." It is more likely that their purpose is to achieve a great coup at the expense of the fools that play the stock market.

In Perishing Russia

The Annals of Pickeye

(In Seven Chapters)

By the Editor of the Old "Pickeye Trumpet"—J. T. Goodman

AN ECHO OF PICKEYE.

Long before 1873 the glory of Pickeye had departed. Only shapeless mounds—the debris of ruined walls and fallen chimneys—marked its site. All was silent and desolate. Even its famous graveyard was a waste.

But it had been discovered that the waters of some springs just across the river possessed remarkable medicinal properties. A hotel was built there, and by 1873 the Sequoia Springs had become a favorite summer-resort.

During the twenty years that witnessed the decay of Pickeye and the rise of the fashionable watering-place the life of little Mary Cross had been a checkered one moving mostly on the dark squares. Dobie Joe had been a kind papa to her, almost as good a one as Elder Beals, and when he married the Widow Allison his little charge was taken into the family. But as time went on and prosperity was gaining them a better social standing, Fanny went on the warpath, with her mother as an ally; so that Dobie Joe, whose jovial and manly spirit had become crushed in the domestic mill, was forced at last to send Mary away.

While yet too young for any but the lightest tasks she went to be the drudge of a family newly come to Pickeye; and after that to another and another, meeting everywhere with the harsh and unloving treatment which is so commonly the share of orphanage. But there was a divine spark in the little one which neither the obloquy of parentage nor the hardship of her lot could extinguish. She was pretty; she had gentle ways and self-respect and modest pride; and, though she was never sent to school, she managed somehow to make the acquaintance of the alphabet and became quite a scholar, in a small way.

But this story has nothing to do with her girlhood. She only appears upon the scene as a waitress at the Sequoia Springs hotel when the influences and experiences of twenty-three years have wrought their effect upon her person and character.

She is tall and beautifully developed, with a wealth of rich brown hair, eyes irresistible in their softness and candor, and a skin as smooth as velvet and as roseate as the dawn. In the discharge of her humble duties, nicely clad and aproned and neatly booted, with only a bud tucked in her hair for ornament, she treads the floor like a nymph fresh from the woods. Many an admiring look is cast at her by the men, many an envious one by the women; but heedless of both she bestows the dishes on the just and unjust as impartially as Providence its rain.

Early in the season there arrived the families of two millionaires, each consisting of a plain mother and a winsome daughter. The names were Kirby and Jellison, and some old-timers who yet lingered in the vicinity avowed they were respectively the wife and daughter of Cape Ann and J-B, who had struck it rich there in the early days and were now wallowing in wealth down at the Bay.

About the same time a journalist, prematurely aged and stooped, registered as C. A. Dinkey, who was none other the same ancient authorities averred than their former townsman C. Augustus Dinkey, the young Foot-hill Bard.

Now, it is one of the phenomena for which scientists have found no satisfactory explanation as yet that the offspring of fortuitous millionaires are disposed to be loud, while journalists are inclined to be quiet. It has been advanced as a possible reason that the former, conscious of their riches, feel that they are a million times better and should be a million times more conspicuous and admired than ordinary mortals, while the latter, sensible of their poverty, are only too glad to enjoy the blessedness of being little. Others assume that the former parade at horse and dog shows through vanity, while the latter seek the stable and kennel only from necessity. All this is mere philosophy, but it has a bearing on the story.

The millionaire families were no sooner established at the hotel than the daughters began exhibiting the peculiar quality just mentioned. But as this is not a treatise on manners their conduct will be ignored save as it related to Mary, as will also the behavior of the journalist except in the same respect.

The first look of the daughters at Mary excited admiration, the succeeding ones only envy and spite. This may be the key to their subsequent treatment of her. She was bidden to do this or that as uncivilly as if she were a slave. She was made to fetch and carry outside her line of duties with no other object than to impress upon her a sense of her servitude. She was scolded and taunted and ridiculed as if she had been created solely as a butt for the sweet millionairesses. Their victim bore it all without a murmur. If she felt any resentment it was hidden under a calm and respectful demeanor. Nothing appeared on the surface but the humble servitor.

Whether to compensate her for the cruelty he could not help observing, or for some other reason, the journalist became very particular in his attention to Mary. It was not merely the repeated thanks that acknowledged the deposition of dishes before him, nor the polite salutations at chance meetings in the hallways or on the stairs (and it was strange how chance favored him in this regard), that showed his interest in the fair waitress. He never failed of a morning to compliment her upon her fresh and blooming appearance and tell her how agreeable it was to behold such a wholesome sight. Mary never replied with more than a thankful expression, but that was enough. In her lone childhood she had found the amulet of silence, and she wore it now so skillfully interwoven with her speech that every word she spoke possessed a charm.

All this attentiveness is positively known, but that the journalist's attention went even further is only an inference. The facts are these: every reader is entitled to his own conclusion. One afternoon Mr. Dinkey and Mary strolled together over the hills and along the bank of the creek that ran close by the hotel. Upon their return it was observed that both were very silent and pensive, Miss Jellison even averring she was cer-

When Stokes Killed Fisk.

By George Fittock.

Save the Fisk-Stokes tragedy, it is said, by no other case of similar character was such widespread and intense interest aroused as that which followed the killing of Stanford White by Harry Thaw. Great, indeed, was the interest aroused by the assassination of Jim Fisk, the Prince of Erie and power behind the Tammany throne in the days of Tweed; greater even than the interest which has been taken in the Thaw case, for the figures involved in the Fisk-Stokes tragedy were much larger than those of the later sensational drama. Jim Fisk's fame as a financier was world-wide, and there was a romantic element in his meteoric career that caused his personality to be an object of unusual interest. Ed Stokes was a man of great prominence in financial and social circles, a cultured man of the world, as popular in London as he was in New York, and the woman in the case, Helen Josephine Mansfield, was a noted beauty, a female of the type that has figured in all the world's great tragedies from the days of Cleopatra down to the days of Lady Hamilton.

It may be worth while reviewing recollections of the Fisk-Stokes tragedy if for no other purpose than to indicate that it is wrong to infer from the disgusting details of the Thaw case that the morals of the country's metropolis are growing worse. By harking back to the days of Jim Fisk we learn that then as now the lives wrecked upon the rock of sensuality were strewn in every direction; that the candle of today around which the human moths lie in myriads of disgusting deaths, is precisely the same one before whose baleful fire in the days of Prince Erie the sanctity of womanhood faded away.

And after the death of Jim Fisk the preachers were inspired by the lesson of his ill-spent life and they delivered homilies of precisely the same character as those that have been suggested by the fate of Stanford White. It is interesting to read over at this time the sermon delivered by Henry Ward Beecher, who was later involved in a little scandal of a most painful character. He spoke of Fisk as a man "as absolutely devoid of shame as the desert of Sahara is of grass, vicious, criminal, abominable in his lusts and flagrant in the violation of public decency. And yet I say to every young man who has looked upon this glaring meteor, and seen his course of prosperity, and thought that perhaps integrity was not so necessary, 'Mark the end of the wicked man' and turn back again to the ways of integrity.'"

There were some moralists who, at the time of the Fisk tragedy, attributed the licentiousness of the day to the baleful activity of the woman's rights advocates who were "holding conventions to assault the established usages of good society." One distinguished moralist charged that whining about woman's wrongs was conducive to the practice of free love. He pointed out that both Fisk and Stokes, who were married men, were free lovers. At that period the doctrine of Free Love and Equal Suffrage were advocated by one body of women and it was feared by some of the alarmists that society was on the verge of disruption. So if we familiarize ourselves with the conditions of thirty years ago we shall be inclined to take a more complacent view of present conditions. As a matter of fact in Fisk's day vice made not the slightest effort to pay homage to public decency. Rich men conducted their amours with brazen indifference to public sentiment. All New York knew of the relations existing between Josie Mansfield, Jim Fisk and Ed Stokes long before the homicide. Fisk was then the most conspicuous figure in the metropolis. He was the great railroad magnate of the day, he dominated the political affairs of the state, he exercised great influence at Washington, and Wall street was under his thumb. His path was strewn with luxuries for himself and largess for his friends. He lived a right royal life and the power worshiping multitude and the vulgar seekers for place hung around him with an abject and obsequious fawning. Fisk made the acquaintance of Josie Mansfield in 1866. She was then twenty-six years old. She had shortly before arrived in New York from this city, where she had spent many years. Josie Mansfield was a woman of most beautiful physique and utterly devoid of principle. She had accumulated something of a past in this state before going to New York. In her girlhood she lived in Stockton where her father Joseph Mansfield conducted the San Joaquin Republican. He was a warm friend of John Bigler, and in the gubernatorial contest in 1854 espoused Bigler's cause so ardently as to excite the anger of John Tabor, editor of the Stockton Journal. The latter challenged him to a duel and they met in mortal combat near the State Insane Asylum. Mansfield was killed. In the following year the widow came to this city with her daughter, who was then nearly fifteen years of age. They lived on Bryant street where they became acquainted with James Carter, a drayman, who fell in love with little Josie. He proposed marriage, and it was agreed that he should send the girl to the Notre Dame convent at San Jose until she attained her majority, after which the wedding should take place. Just before reaching her eighteenth year Josie Mansfield ran away from the convent and eloped with Frank Lawlor an actor belonging to the stock company at Maguire's Opera House. They came to this city and lived until one day a scandal broke out over Mrs. Lawlor's flirtation with D. W. Perley, Judge Terry's law partner. Both Lawlor and his wife were involved in a public disgrace and they left town. After traveling through the East for awhile Mrs. Lawlor grew tired of her husband, obtained a divorce, resumed her maiden name and went on the stage. It was a little later that she met Jim Fisk who provided her with a home.

Fisk became so deeply involved with this woman that he not only supported her in grand style but made a confidant of her; made her the custodian of business secrets, wrote frank, foolish letters to her, took his friends and associates to her house to dine and to spend the evening at cards and thus placing himself almost wholly in her power. The truth is he loved Josephine Mansfield. He told her so—and, alas! he wrote her so. She kept his letters, and afterwards when they quarreled, she threatened to publish them. Fisk tried to "buy her off," then invoked the power of the court, obtaining an injunction, which was dissolved by his death after which the letters were published.

In her wanderings previous to her meeting with Fisk, Miss Mansfield met Ed Stokes in Philadelphia. He was younger than Fisk by about six years, and not more than three years the senior of Josie Mansfield. He had an interest in a large oil refinery in Brooklyn in which Fisk became part owner. Fisk and Stokes became close friends. Jealousy made them bitter enemies. When Stokes became Fisk's rival in Josie Mansfield's affections the great financier pleaded with the woman to exclude his friend from her house. Instead she excluded him from the home he had bought for her. He resolved to be revenged. Business quarrels followed and Fisk had Stokes arrested for embezzlement. Fisk was threatened with the publication of his letters, and he was told he could buy them for $200,000. The letters were characteristic of the man, and were of such a nature that he would have given a good deal of money to suppress them. The letters show how completely the man was in the power of the woman, and they tell the whole story of their disgraceful amours. They show that even after he found that the woman was unfaithful to him and after she revealed her true character to him she was able to win him back again. In a letter written to her in October 1870 he said:

"What must I think of a woman who would veil my eyes, first by a gentle kiss, and afterward, night and day, for weeks, months and years, by deceit and fraud, lead me through the dark valley of trouble, when she could have made my path one of roses, committing crimes which a devil incarnate would shrink from, while all this time I showed her nothing but kindness, both in words and actions, laying at your feet a soul, a heart, a fortune and a reputation which had cost by night and day twenty-five years of perpetual struggle, and which, but for the black blot of having in an evil hour linked itself with you, would stand out today brighter than any other ever seen upon earth. But the mist has fallen and you appear in your true light. I borrow your own words to describe you, 'a snake in the grass,' and verily I have found thee out. How I worship the night I said 'Get thee behind me, Satan!' The four weeks that have elapsed since that blessed hour, how I bless them for the peace of mind they have brought me. Again the world looks bright and I have a being."

Notwithstanding the bitter sentiments of that letter we find Fisk a month later writing to his "darling" in terms of endearment. They had become lovers again. But only for a short period. One day Fisk caused the publication of an affidavit made by one of Josie Mansfield's servants in which the affiant related that he had heard the woman and Stokes plotting to extort money by blackmail. Then Josie Mansfield sued Fisk for libel and Fisk retaliated by having Stokes and the woman indicted for perjury and conspiracy. The day of the filing of the indictments Stokes went gunning for Fisk. On the afternoon of January 6, 1872, Edward Stokes stood on the first floor of the Grand Central Hotel, near the stairway, waiting for Fisk. He knew that Fisk had an appointment at the hotel. He had not to wait long. Presently Fisk put in an appearance and walked up the stairway. Stokes standing above him, resting his revolver on the rail, fired two shots, one of which struck Fisk in the abdomen. That was the fatal shot. Fisk died the following day. The news of the assassination was flashed to every part of the country and was commented on by the press of Europe. "Not since the assassination of Lincoln," said one paper, "has the death of any one man seemed to so excite public attention and comment in every quarter of the globe. Despite the iniquities of Jim Fisk's life there was general sorrow at his death for he was a man noted for his kindly nature and his great charities. Fisk has furnished the material for many tales illustrative of the proverbial Yankee pluck and energy. He was a man of prodigious executive capacity, indomitable pluck and a clearness of perception in forecasting results which was truly remarkable. He entered New York a young man and a stranger. He grappled in Wall street with men who had during many years ruled the money market of the nation and he overmatched the greatest and all of them. But with all his force of character he succumbed to the witcheries of a woman and died an ignoble death at the hands of a weak wretch who had outmaneuvered him in the game of love.

The trial of Stokes was watched with intense interest. The murderer made a great battle for his life and he had tremendous social influence behind him. His defense was that Fisk had robbed him of all his money; that he had $200,000 when he entered into partnership with the great financier and that the latter absorbed it all. This defense was pooh-poohed by the prosecution and abundant evidence was introduced to show that the men had quarreled over the woman and that there had been a conspiracy to extort money from Fisk. The jury found the defendant guilty and he was sentenced to be hanged. He obtained a new trial and was sentenced to life imprisonment. Again he appealed and was finally sentenced to fourteen years imprisonment. He was pardoned after serving about five years and emerged from prison broken in health and spirits. But he inherited a fortune a little later, bought the Hoffman House and conducted it until his death a few years ago. It was reported that he never regained his nerve and that he always slept in a lighted room.

The Great Rosenthal.

By the Rhapsodist

It was "Rosenthal Week" among the musicians and musical amateurs last week, and an exciting four days they had of it. Most of the enthusiasts who attended the Thursday night and Saturday and Sunday matinees here made the pilgrimage over to Berkeley on Friday afternoon to hear Rosenthal play the Chopin and Liszt concertos with the University Orchestra. Let it be said at once that Rosenthal is an extraordinary pianist, absolutely in a class by himself. Whether he is the greatest of pianists is likely to be contested always, but it is universally conceded that his technic is more nearly perfect than that of any other artist of his instrument, and there are many,—very many—who believe him to be the most important personality among living pianists. In the matter of interpretation there is so little of a fixed standard that the discussions one overhears at the close of all the concerts given by visiting artists are usually in the nature of arguments, and the professional musicians themselves are no nearer a unit in their estimates of the artistic worth of their confreres than are the dilettanti. On one point at least we can all agree—that Rosenthal's power to arouse and excite his audiences is unsurpassed. At the close of each of the recitals there was a scene of wildest enthusiasm that had its climax at the Sunday matinee after the Don Juan Fantasia. A perfect torrent of noise broke forth then, clapping, shouting, stamping, until after twelve or fifteen minutes Rosenthal finally seated himself at the piano once more. This ability to produce a fever heat of excitement in his audiences testifies strongly to the dominant power of the artist's personality, a power which even the least musical of his listeners is unable to resist. The first programme, Thursday night, included the Chopin B minor Sonata, one of the things Rosenthal received most praise for during his former visit here. The marvelous beauty of the first movement, the exquisite lightness and fleetness of the Scherzo, the soulful Largo, all bore the stamp of supremest degree of artistic interpretation, while the Finale with its sinister theme and chaotic treatment was played with a virility and tempestuous abandon that was simply overwhelming. No other pianist portrays so impressively the diabolical grimness of this Finale. It is one of Rosenthal's chef d'oeuvres. Another number was the Chopin-Liszt "Meine Freuden," the arrangement that Liszt himself played and differing somewhat from the published transcription. Rosenthal's rendition of it was poetic in the extreme. His own contrapuntal study in thirds on the Chopin "Minute Waltz" is beautiful as well as clever, and was insistently redemanded. The "Papillons" by Rosenthal is immensely captivating; a graceful melody interwoven in a mesh of shimmering, gossamer harmonies that might be the fluttering of the wings of myriads of butterflies. It was entrancingly played, with a feathery lightness of touch and an endless variety of nuances. Rosenthal's Humoresque and Fugue on Strauss themes closed the programme in an electrifying manner. It is a magnificent arrangement of the lovely waltzes and the dazzling brilliance with which Rosenthal plays it is probably unattainable to any other pianist.

Of the Saturday programme, some of the best things were the Weber A flat Sonata, Chopin B minor Sonata, and the tremendous Paganini variations of Brahms. The Weber Sonata was read with delightful freshness and was as great a contrast as could be imagined to the melancholy sentiment of the Schumann Aria which succeeded it. In spontaneity of feeling and diversity of moods it seemed to me that Rosenthal was roused to the highest degree on Saturday, and played more temperamentally than at the other recitals. The enormously difficult Brahms variations were played with translucent clarity, exquisite taste, and a superb bravura that may only be indulged in by the possessor of a Rosenthalian infallibility of technic. The closing number was a "Blue Danube Fantasia" by Strauss-Rosenthal. While less elaborate and complicated than the Humoresque of Saturday's programme it is perhaps of more intrinsic musical beauty and is a delightful substitute for the accustomed Liszt Rhapsodies that are oftenest used to end piano recitals.

The Sunday programme was full of good things, among which was an authoritative reading of the Beethoven Sonata Op. 109 in which much sentiment predominated. To Rosenthal's rendition of the Schumann Carnival I must give precedence over that of every other pianist. It is charged with an iridescent charm, a piquancy of rhythm and an exhilaration that I have never heard equaled. A Chopin group followed this that included the dreamy Berceuse, Barearolle and C sharp minor Waltz, which latter was played in a particularly soulful manner. Davidoff's "At the Fountain" is a composition for the violincello of which Rosenthal has made a piano transcription that is a gem, and he could not proceed with his programme until he had repeated it. The Don Juan Fantasie was the crowning event of these three great recitals. It is impossible to describe the vastness of effects Rosenthal produces with this Mozart-Liszt composition. It is a feat sui generis in piano playing. Climax is piled upon climax until it becomes unrealizable that one man is producing all of the gorgeous tone color. The pulse of the entire audience was beating abnormally by the time Rosenthal finished Don Juan, and the tumult that ensued was unforgettable. If Rosenthal is not the greatest pianist of his time he is quite surely one of the greatest apparitions in the realm of modern music.

The sixteenth Symphony Concert of the University Orchestra took place on the afternoon of March first and was in fact more of a vehicle to display the pianistic necromancy of Moriz Rosenthal than anything else. The programme consisted of the Leonora Overture No. 3 of Beethoven and the Indian Suite of MacDowell, interspersed by the piano Concerto in E minor of Chopin, and the Liszt E flat major Concerto. Harmon Gymnasium was packed to suffocation by worshippers of the muse from both sides of the bay, and Dr. Wolle was given a very cordial reception at his entrance. Of the orchestra numbers, interest attaches particularly to the MacDowell Suite on account of the pitiful situation of its author at the present moment, but just for this reason it seems unwise to enter into critical discussion of its merits, for the proper classification of MacDowell's works will come about only after his death.

Probably all of the representative pianists of California were assembled to listen to Rosenthal's version of the Chopin Concerto with orchestra, the work having had but two prior hearings in California, by Joseffy and Mansfeldt, both events being more than twenty years past. Some uncertainty was felt regarding the adequacy of the accompaniment the orchestra might furnish owing to the insufficiency of rehearsals, but Dr. Wolle played his orchestra efficiently in both concertos and is entitled to very much praise for this result under adverse circumstances. The wonderfully dramatic first movement of the Chopin Concerto was delivered with splendid breadth and fervor by Rosenthal so that it almost overshadowed the sweetness and tenderness of the Romanze. But the Rondo, piquant and mellifluous at the hands of this master pianist, completely captivated the connoisseurs. The Liszt Concerto came later, and a more successful exploitation of its beauties than that furnished by Rosenthal cannot be conceived. From the majestic grandeur of the opening octaves, through the lovely Adagio, to the delightful verve of the Allegro Marziale the audience was fascinated and spellbound, and a storm of applause greeted its conclusion. It was a gala day in musical circles, and it is to be hoped frequent opportunities will be afforded by the University to hear the visiting artists with orchestra.

The Sea-Tryst.

By Mabel Porter Pitts

When the tide is at ebb and the rocks lie bare
In the stretch of a crag-strewn run,
Then the sea-children hide in their mossy lair
From the blaze of the midday sun.

'Neath a niche where the phosphoret incense curls
At the end of a gem-lit hall
Rests the mermaiden queen on a couch of pearls
That is backed by a trophied wall.

And with coral the spoil of the chase is hung,
And with lichen the broken bark,
All aglint is the spar where a white hand clung
Ere it sunk in the storm-swept dark.

Here to think of the frolic of hunts long made,
Here to dream of the sport undone,
Here to rest in the hush of the cooling shade
Till the time of the setting sun,

Then away where the emerald waves break white
On the breast of a shoal marked track,
Swift to ride in the pale of a moonlit night
On the curve of a dolphin's back.

And her lover who waits in the cliff afar
Marks the course in the surging green
Of the steed as it comes like a shooting star
With the beautiful mermaid queen.

And O what to the lips as they meet and thrill
And O what to the arms that cling
Is the ship that must yield to the ocean's will Like a gull with a broken wing?

And O what to the maid if a throne be won
If the wealth of her youth's unsown?
Though her hand be the troth of the sea-king's son
Yet the blood of her heart's her own.

A Corporation Conspiracy

A few months ago it was supposed that Mayor Schmitz was getting ready to receive the viaticum for his journey into the valley of the shadow of the penitentiary, and we were preparing to hum a requiem over his political corpse. We fondly imagined that the reign of this sceptred acrobat over an eclipse of the common sense of the community was at an end, and there seemed to hover over the ruins of the city a prescience of fairer things. But now comes the report that his spring-board is being carefully mended and that he is about to take another leap into popular favor. The news comes by way of New York. In the Sun of that city was printed last week a story to the effect that "his friends among heads of big San Francisco corporations having headquarters in New York" had agreed to get behind him for a fourth term. "The programme of these corporations," says the Sun, "is to re-elect Schmitz as Mayor and he will name candidates for supervisors on the labor ticket so objectionable that they can be easily defeated by men selected by the corporations. This programme has no place for Abe Ruef, who will be driven out of politics. The corporation interests, who hope to control the city, with the Mayor and Supervisors willing to grant all their demands, will pay their debt to Schmitz by using their influence to prevent his conviction."

The Gompers Banquet

This story is not so improbable as it may seem at first blush. The supposition is that Schmitz alienated Union Labor sentiment by his acquiescence in the Roosevelt Japanese policy and that therefore he will no longer be able to control the labor vote. But his friends say it will soon appear that he really achieved a great strategic triumph at Washington, and they remind those with whom they discuss the matter that while at the capital and after his conference with the President he was banqueted by Samuel Gompers. There was great significance, by the way, in that Gompers banquet. This I learn from one of the esoteric council of Union Labor, who reminded me that when Gompers visited this city he eschewed the society of Mayor Schmitz and of all that political labor faction whose principles are embodied in Schmitzism. It was the hospitality of Schmitz's bitter enemies that Gompers accepted, and the great prophet of unionism was liberally quoted in reprobation of Schmitz and all his works and pomps. "Now," said my esoteric informant, winking in rounded periods of facial eloquence, "perhaps you can understand why President Roosevelt was so eager for Mayor Schmitz to journey to Washington."

A Secret Dispatch

Intent upon eliciting more copious details I suggested that these utterances were somewhat vague. "It's as plain as a pike-staff," said my informant. "Gompers is the man that persuaded Schmitz to fall down. Roosevelt has Gompers hypnotized. Gompers agreed to go to the front for Schmitz if Schmitz would make things easy for the President, and it was a secret dispatch from Gompers that lured the Mayor to Washington. So don't make the mistake of imagining that Eugene lost his head. He will come out of this thing with flying colors and be stronger with union labor than ever." That's the story in a nutshell and it is far from implausible. There is no doubt that Gompers snubbed Schmitz in this city. He spent most of his time while here with the Franklin K. Lane push, and was greatly shocked to find that union labor was identified with a corrupt city government. But in Washington he extended the gladhand to the indicted Mayor and ostentatiously bestowed on him the mark of his exalted approval. So perhaps it is wrong to assume that our prize mountebank is eligible to admission to the Down and Out Club. He is a man of wonderful recuperative powers. What a great joke it would be if instead of alienating union labor sentiment it turned out that he was more strongly intrenched than ever!

The Irremovable Incubus

If Mayor Schmitz is not a man of destiny he is at least the antithesis of the humdrum. The fires of his charlantry frequently wane but there is always a fresh supply of fuel accessible. He is like the prize-fighter who always has a punch left and never takes the count. He is an incubus that degenerates but never sloughs entirely off. He is as persistent as the boll weevil or that other entomological devil, the pin borer, which has challenged the bugologists at Washington to a struggle of peculiar bitterness. While he remains at large he must be reckoned with; at least until prosperity has run its course, for while union labor is under no delusions respecting the disingenuousness of him it is believed that while he occupies the position of Mayor the employers of labor will be constrained to submit to union discipline.

The Staff Colonels

There is a look of glad expectancy on the face of the moon. For the Queen of night knows that California has a new Governor and that one of the first duties of his Excellency after getting the legislature off his hands is to round up his kaleidoscopic staff of officers. There is nothing more important in the affairs of state than the selection of the Colonels for the Governor's staff. The Colonels are the glittering ornaments of the gubernatorial office. More than that; they are symbols of the rights reserved by the state. By the Governor's staff we are reminded that the state has its own military force and that the Governor is charged with the solemn duty of maintaining the peace and dignity of the commonwealth. So great is the martial spirit prevalent in this state that there is never a dearth of candidates for staff positions. Every county in the state abounds in men ready and eager to serve the Governor in brass buttons and gold braid. Indeed there is keen competition for the privilege of wearing the resplendent staff uniform on state occasions. Remarkable is the abundance of that peculiar temperament which revels in tinsel and conspicuous dress. So infrequent are war alarms and so remote the probability of a Governor's being called upon to command the state troops, that the duties of a staff colonel are purely ornamental, and it is the principal business of the members of the staff to justify the exhibition of themselves in full regalia. They are the uniformed, bedizened, magnificent, beautiful heroes of peace. They have been invidiously designated the royalists of Lobsteria, and I have heard it suggested that the staff should be pronounced an anachronism and sacrificed on the altar of democracy in token of our emancipation from the monarchical fripperies and mummeries of the Old World, but to me these silly prejudices are abominable. The Colonels symbolize the strong arm of the state and they are as useful as the great seal. Besides they beautify the landscape whenever the opportunity offers. No sensible man has the envious and impotent wish to tumble these pillars of the temple of Mars. Fanatical peace propagandists object to them on account of the principle for which they stand, but this objection is absurd. They are not really and truly standing for anything that savors of combat. As often as otherwise the apparel belies the man. Whenever I meet a panoplied officer of the Governor's staff, I know that way down in his heart he has great contempt for the arbitrament of arms, and I respect him for his Hague sentiments. Let us drink to the health of the heroes of the staff.

A Revolt Against Puritanism

Over in the reposeful village of Alameda, separated from Oakland by the river Lethe, the artificial island where grow the poppies from whose juices Night distills slumbers, the drowsy inhabitants are unaware of the excitement in the northern end of the county over the prospective transplanting of the state capital. The people of Alameda township take no interest in foreign affairs. They have troubles enough of their own. Besides all the emotion of which they are capable is stirred by a political contest. They adopted a charter recently and decided to have a mayor in order to raise the village to the dignity of a metropolis, and now there are two distinguished citizens running for the coveted job. One of them is a Mr. Forderer, a merchant, and the other is Colonel E. K. Taylor, a lawyer. I am awaiting the result of this inspiring contest with breathless interest, for by this contest will be determined, it is said, the character of the community. Alameda, be it known, has long prided itself on being a highly moral village. Its moral tone is indicated by several circumstances: it keeps very holy the Sabbath, it goes to bed with the chickens and it forbids absolutely the sale of cigarettes. But of late there has grown up in the village an element conspicuous for its heterodox sentiments. It revolts against anti-cigarette legislation as a mark of puritanical prejudice. It is in favor of lifting the lid not because it wishes to engage in a cigarette debauch but because it believes that anything that savors of Puritanism is discreditable. The issue is clearly defined, but the question that puzzles me is, Which candidate embodies the Puritanical sentiment and which is in favor of lifting the lid. It looks easy but it isn't.

Perplexed by a Clergyman

One day I was told by a lid-lifter that Colonel Taylor is the man that should be elected because he is broad-minded, liberal, honest and in favor of prohibiting the sale of cigarettes to minors but not to adults. My informant told me that Mr. Forderer teaches a Sunday school and is aggressively virtuous; and when he added that Colonel Taylor belonged to the Elks, it seemed obvious that the candidates clearly typified the conflicting sentiment of the community. But a few days later I met the Rev. McFarland and he filled me with perplexity.

"I'm very busy," he said.

"Preparing a new sermon?" I asked.

"No," he said, "but I'm up to my ears in this may-oralty contest.

"You're out for Forderer!" I suggested.

The clergyman gave me a look of ineffable scorn. "No, indeed!" he said; "I'm for Colonel Taylor."

As the Rev. Dr. McFarland is the most aggressive reformer in Alameda, being the man that prosecuted cigar dealers for selling cigarettes and that suppressed other immoral pursuits, I tried to figure out how it was that he had espoused the cause of a jolly Elk to the prejudice of a Sunday school teacher.

A Singular Prejudice

The next gentleman with whom I discussed the may-oralty contest is one of the literati of journalism. He told me that he knew absolutely nothing of the qualifications of the candidates or of the sentiment or difference of sentiment in the community. He did not even know that Colonel Taylor was running for Mayor. The only thing about which he had any reliable information was his own sentiment respecting Forderer. He had made up his mind to vote for the other fellow. He doesn't know Mr. Forderer but he does know that Mr. Forderer maintains in his front garden a huge metallic effigy of the goddess of wisdom and skill who sprang full-armed from the brain of Jupiter. This statue is not quite so large as the one on the Acropolis that could be seen twenty miles at sea, but it can be seen from the railroad train, and it offends the critical eye of the young journalist and shocks him beyond expression. This Minerva is almost tall enough to look into the second-story window and presents rather a grotesque appearance in her environment, but this circumstance argues nothing against Mr. Forderer's qualification for the office he seeks to adorn. It may be said of him that he at least shows a commendable public spirit in introducing to the people of Alameda the patroness of all the liberal arts and sciences. It seems most unjust that for this he should lose a vote.

The Conflict of Sentiment

The capital removal proposition has already caused much rage and rhetoric, but the troublous waters distilled from the clash of interests have as yet but faintly premonished the roar that will soon resound o'er hill and dale. There is gathering a mighty torrent of words to deluge the state. During the coming spring months typewriters will be multiplied in two bureaus of publicity on a scale of geometrical progression, and no effort will be spared to exhaust the flexible topic of the proposed decapitalization of Sacramento. Let us squat in ecstatic expectation of large wads of remonstrances and appeals from the town up the river and of glad strophes on its transcendent charms from the cultured village across the bay. In Sacramento facts and figures are already being marshaled. Over in Berkeley a melody of big bargains in town lots on easy installments is being industriously churned. Berkeley is large with confidence and has all the outward seeming of a sure winner. Banzai! is wafted on the breezes that blow off shore. The hysteria prevalent in Sacramento warrants the suspicion that the people are conscious of being at odds with the inevitable.

The Tragic Feature

This capital removal proposition has its tragic as well as its comic aspect. At first Sacramento looked upon it as a joke, but when it was learned that the legislature was in deadly earnest the spirits of the community were congealed. The blow was especially severe for the reason that Sacramento has been having its first experience with a boom. For over a quarter of a century and up to a few months ago the old town was suffering from a torpid liver. It was never more than half awake. But suddenly it realized that the Western Pacific was coming in, and about that time some foreign capitalists ran across it on the map. Engineers began laying out lines for suburban electric roads, a lot of French capital was invested in a scheme for the reclamation of 85,000 acres of land a short distance above the city, and several other big industrial enterprises were getting ready to make Sacramento their headquarters. Suddenly the town stretched itself, sat up and came to realization of the potentialities. One of the first symptoms of threatened prosperity was an upward tendency in the real estate market, and just before the removal scheme was broached realty values were jumping in a way that bewildered the oldest inhabitant. Los Angeles in its boomiest boom time never saw suburban lots soar as they have been soaring at the capital. But as soon as it was learned that the town was in danger of losing its prestige and its pride a halt was called. Not only did the real estate market sink into repose, but capitalists with money to back new enterprises abated their energies. Of course Sacramento is not to be seriously crippled by the loss of the capital. It is the principal city of a great and growing industrial centre and is bound to make rapid progress in the coming decade, but it would be much better off if the removal proposition could be decided in a day. It is the uncertainty of its status which makes the situation embarrassing and hurtful.

Some Grievances

The people of the capital are of the opinion that they are being punished for their sins against the Republican machine. In this opinion they are not entirely correct, though it is probable that if they had not been so aggressively querulous and so willing to sympathize with the unlamented Pardee in his violent attack of soreheadedness the Berkeley boomers might not have been able to triumph in the Legislature. The politicians of Sacramento are a snappy lot and take themselves quite seriously. Their favorite diversion is jumping the traces. Besides Editor McClatchy of the Bee is a rather censorious journalist who is ever mindful of his tremendous responsibilities as a moulder of public opinion, and visiting statesmen object to McClatchy criticism on the ground that they are the guests of the city and should receive hospitable treatment at the hands of its citizens. I am told that some of the legislators would like to have it understood that they were glad of the opportunity to resent McClatchyisms, but I believe the editor of the Bee would be highly pleased if told that he had been converted into a pretext for the removal of the capital. McClatchy is a product of the climate of Sacramento. He is indigenous to the soil. He bulks big in the Sacramento eye. He publishes a paper in the interest of the pee-pul and he is ever on the alert to battle for their rights. A man of sovereign parts is McClatchy, a scourge of politicians' iniquities, a refiner of the state, one of the most distinguished of the militant representatives of the rural press. Editor McClatchy doesn't care whether the capital stays at Sacramento or not. One thing sure: conscious of duties well performed, if the capital is to be moved on his account he can afford to thump his brisket and exclaim: Well done thou good and faithful servant—of the pee-pul.

An Unpleasant Topic

Many of the people of Sacramento affirm their absolute indifference to the proposed shifting of the capital. Their only concern is the reputation of the city for climate. It has been said that the capital should be removed because it's a disagreeable place to make laws in. This the people of Sacramento resent and they have proved the futility of statistics by producing some to show that their climate is superior to Berkeley's. It is unfortunate that this question should be involved. We should be eager to have it generally understood that there is no bad climate in California, but one must needs be a paradoxist to affirm that the climate of Sacramento is an aid to the promotion of virtue or that it is a tonic that exalts the spirit like wine. For as a matter of fact the climate of Sacramento is below par. Yet the weather records show that Sacramento has more clear days than Berkeley has. This cannot be gainsaid. But the clearness of many of the days at Sacramento is entirely due to the fact that the sun leaves his orbit to become neighborly and forgets to take his warmth away with him at night. But I regret that Sacramento's climate has been dragged into this controversy. Sacramento's climate is one of those things that cannot be discussed without being smudged.

The Executive Mansion

If the people decide to remove the capital the state will have a fine mansion on its hands, the one that was purchased by Governor Pardee for $48,000. This mansion is one of the historic homes of Sacramento. It was built by Albert Gallatin, father of Mrs. Frank Powers, in the heyday of his career. From an humble position in the store of Huntington, Hopkins & Co. Gallatin rose to membership in the firm from which he retired with about $800,000. While a member of the firm it advanced large sums of money to the Folsom Water Power Company which drifted into financial straits. As a consequence Huntington, Hopkins & Co. had to pay several big notes and Gallatin's share of the loss was about $100,000. Later his fortune dwindled and he was obliged to sell his home. It was purchased by Joseph Steffens, father of Lincoln Steffens, the muck-raker, and by him it was sold to the state. It is now occupied as a residence by Governor Gillett.

Tenacious Chauncey

Down around the Custom House Chauncey M. St. John is looked upon as a political wizard. He is pointed out as the man who coolly disregarded a request—you might say command—of the Treasury Department to resign his position as Special Deputy Surveyor of the Port, a position that carries prestige and a salary of $3,600 a year. When it became known that St. John had been asked to resign there was great surprise, as he is looked upon as one of the most efficient and faithful Federal officials in San Francisco. "But his head drops now," mourned his friends. St. John was not so easily vanquished as all that. Although he refused to give out a word for publication, he employed his nine days' grace with good effect. The daily papers have been scrambling for information as to what influence he brought to bear to counteract the desire of the Treasury Department for his resignation. A Washington friend writes me that St. John has more influence in the national capitol than either his friends or his enemies here suspect. He says that Loeb took a personal interest in the contemplated ousting of the Deputy Surveyor, and that much influence was brought to bear on the President by men who were mutual friends of both St. John and Roosevelt. They pointed out that the whole affair was inspired by politics and spite, and that practical dismissal was not a fitting fate for a faithful government servant. Events at this end of the line indicate that my informant was right. When the day came for St. John to resign he simply did not do so. It was predicted even by his friends, few of whom knew what had been going on in his behalf at Washington, that the following day would bring a curt dismissal. It did not come, nor on the next day, nor the next. In fact, up to the present writing, St. John still holds his posi-

The New Model G

CADILLAC

Persistent demand for a thoroughly high-grade, medium-powered, four-cylinder automobile, at a price somewhat lower than the large touring cars, has led to the production of our new Cadillac Model G.

At every stage of designing and finishing Model G has received all the care and thought that could possibly be given a car costing twice as much.

The motor is finished in its vital parts to gauges that insure mechanical accuracy to the thousandth of an inch. It is equipped with our automatic ring type governor; a new type of muffler is used, giving a silent exhaust, at the same time almost entirely eliminating back pressure.

Direct shaft drive; transmission of a selective type sliding gear. Direct drive on high speed with no gears in mesh. Wheel base, 100 inches; stylish body design.

tion. A dismissal may be on the way by letter. My Washington informant thinks not. At any rate, St. John is looked upon as having downed his enemies. They contemplated his retirement in disgrace and were chagrined that he called their bluff.

An Indignant Husband In the Case

Though it is well known that with the exception of Colonel John P. Irish St. John is cordially disliked by the heads of the Federal departments in this city they disclaim having conspired for his dismissal. From the midst of this antagonistic circle comes the hint that it was an influential citizen of Denver that prevailed upon the authorities at Washington to lift the St. John scalp. Some years ago the wife of this Denverite had a bad quarter of an hour with the Deputy Surveyor of Port. She owned some goods which she had forgotten to mention and as a consequence she was held up. Among the goods were dainty articles of wearing apparel of which photographs were taken for reproduction in one of the daily papers. The husband of the lady was furious at the flaunting of his wife's personal effects in the public prints, and it is said that somebody informed him that the reporters gained access to them through St. John, and that he went away vowing vengeance. This story is discredited by St. John's friends.

Reynolds is Suspected

These friends are inclined to the opinion that the undoing of St. John was managed with the assistance of Assistant Secretary J. B. Reynolds who was out here not long ago, and who was entertained by Collector F. S. Stratton. While Mr. Stratton has never exhibited any hostility to St. John, some of the civil service men in the office have not concealed their prejudices. It is said that Mr. "Billy" Hamilton met Mr. Reynolds when he was out here, but Hamilton's friends say that he loves leisure too much to muster up sufficient energy to put in a knock. And as for the intimation that the achievements of St. John in the role of detector of smugglers contrast significantly with the record of his successor, that is a matter hardly worth discussing. St. John gave the smugglers such a scare that they quit smuggling. That's all there is to it. He simply made it impossible for his successor to win any glory but that would hardly justify the sending on of a complaint to Washington. But from the potpourri of views resultant from the explosion of the official bomb 'neath St. John's chair it is quite evident that there is friction in the service and that Chauncey has been at odds with the machine. Which is quite unfortunate since he is undoubtedly a zealous, conscientious official.

Dare's Story

Appraiser John T. Dare, who too has been requested to resign, and who in his well-known emphatic manner swears—actually swears—that he will not resign, tells a story that fits the Custom House situation. "I was in Washington some years ago," he says, "and was talking to Senator Duboce and some one whose name I have forgotten. This third party was not a politician, but he was interested in the ways of the tribe. Said he to Duboice, 'I suppose, Senator, that filling vacancies is quite a problem,' 'Not a bit of it,' was the reply; 'the problem is to create them.'"

The Prince Booms Harriman

Will Crocker's brother-in-law, Prince Poniatowski, who failed ignominiously in his efforts to make a frenzied financier out of Mr. Crocker, but who made things hum and Mr. Crocker dizzy for awhile, has turned press agent for Mr. Harriman in Paris. Mr. Harriman occasionally finds use for French capital, and Prince Poniatowski is now capitalizing in Paris his knowledge of American industrial affairs. In the Paris Temps one night recently there appeared an article from the pen of the Prince which amounted to an apotheosis of Mr. Harriman. The writer took pains to say before any one had an opportunity to challenge him that his article was not called forth by any exigency of the moment. On the contrary, it was merely the result of his fortunate relations during the last ten years with the principal people concerned in the railroad manoeuvres which gave rise to President Roosevelt's inquiry through the Interstate Commerce Commission into the operations which Mr. Harriman instigated in his endeavor to make the Union Pacific Railroad both a profitable property and a great artery of commerce. Perhaps Prince Poniatowski's position is beyond suspicion of interestedness, but it will provoke a broad smile in the Pacific-Union Club, where it is known that the distinguished brother-in-law of the Crocker's had no experience in railroading except such as he obtained from his connection with the little Sierra road and the spur track connecting the Ingleside race track with the main artery of the Southern Pacific between San Francisco and San Jose. Shortly before leaving this city where he met with several financial mishaps, among them that of the collapse of a race-track enterprise for which Mayor Phelan was responsible, he tried to interest Eastern capital in a transcontinental scheme but failed. Nobody ever heard of his association with Mr. Harriman, but from the article in the Temps I should judge that he is close up at this moment.

Some Inside Facts

The Prince informed the readers of the Temps that when other railroad men believed that the limit of railroad development in the United States had been reached Mr. Harriman alone foresaw the possibilities of this wonderful country. He allied himself with Messrs. Stillman, Rockefeller and Frick and bought the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, taking pains to guard his management to such an extent that he in his wisdom could order the company's affairs, though nominally not controlling them. Mr. Harriman, while preserving the best will for Kuhn, Loeb & Co., obtained the support of Messrs. Stillman, Rockefeller and Frick as a counterpoise. In an apology for the cruel attacks on Mr. Harriman the Prince says: "Mr. Harriman has been reproached for being insufficiently diplomatic toward his enemies. Perhaps all his diplomacy was required for his immediate entourage. Certainly with consummate diplomacy he placed the Union Pacific in a position of financial independence unknown in United States railroading before his day." Prince Poniatowski says it was the publication of the remarkable financial condition of the Union Pacific, due to Mr. Harriman's foresight, which led to President Roosevelt's inquiry through the commission. The Temps headed the article: "Financial Policy in the United States," and says that nobody is better equipped than the Prince to speak on the subject. It is evident that the Prince has been keeping in close touch with the affairs of the New York financial magnates since he took up his residence in Paris. He evidently knows more about them now than he did when in this city. While on the subject of Harriman's enemies, however, he neglected to discuss the misrepresentation that followed the ousting of Stuyvesant Fish from the presidency of the Illinois Central. Mr. Harriman's enemies made much of that episode, charging him with ingratitude to the friend of his youth. He submitted to the abuse probably expecting that Fish would be man enough to vindicate him. But Fish remained silent. Now we know that Fish was removed because of his frenzied financiering; that on two occasions he loaned the funds of the railroad to a trust company in which he was financially interested and which was not financially sound. But since these revelations we have heard no criticism of the immaculate Wall street financier.

feed shop is still the potent magnet that draws the hilarious picnicker, the drifting Bohemian and the kid gloved diletante "seeing life." No one visiting his place last Sunday would have guessed that San Francisco was emerging from the greatest fire in history. There was the same careless, noisy, exuberant crowd gathered about the loaded tables as there was on the Sunday before the quake. The songs were as spontaneous, the choruses as mad and the impatient crowd waiting for seats were as tired, hungry and anxious as in the blithe days of yore. Bon homme Sanguinetti shepherded them as easily, adroitly and confidently as of old and every one of the several hundred who had the price left the place gorged and happy.

A Dexterous Diplomat

Mine host Kirkpatrick of the Palace has a world-wide reputation for his tactful, graceful way in handling the fretful tourists of all nations, but Monsieur Kirkpatrick with all his Chesterfield-Talleyrand accomplishments would take to the woods or wildly call the police patrol if he assumed Sanguinetti's job for a brief ten minutes. Years of experience alone have fitted Steve for the place. Under his unruffled rule the mixed mob of longshoremen, bohemians, teamsters, bank clerks, carpenters, University students, pugilists, ribbon counter ladies, shop girls, cannery flossies, roving tourists, house maids and fitting butterflies from the avenues eat and chat and drink the red wine that somebody makes somewhere. Under the broad aegis of his dominant sway they stuff in peace and have a glorious fifty-cent time. War is constantly in the air—that is one of the spices that add zest to the entertainment, as witness the following:

Feeding As a Peaceful Art

Last Sunday a teamster entered with his Flossie and was started well down the line that leads from soup to black coffee when a natty middleweight clerk and his buxom lassie dropped into seats opposite. It was the rush hour and very soon the place was packed and the active waiters were working the speed limit. It so happened that the clerk was anxious to cut out a quick meal and make an early run with his lady friend to the Orpheum. With his knowledge of Sanguinetti's he saw that he must somehow get quicker action out of the waiter. Accordingly he followed him to the kitchen door, slipped him a half dollar and told him to bring the service of the man ahead of him. The waiter said he would, but this service happened to be that of the teamster. It wasn't long before the latter realized that somehow he had been tricked out of his place in the procession. He expressed his feelings by making several sarcastic remarks to Flossie which were completely lost on the clerk, who knew that a rumpus meant the missing of the show. Ignored in this fashion the teamster began to draw several heavy dishes within easier reach while his remarks became more pointed. The clerk's partner began to bristle so the clerk began to glower. When the waiter came along with the roast for the clerk the teamster opened up his batteries of abuse and carefully fingered a platter under the strict rules of prepared defense. Sparks were in the air and an explosion imminent when the alert Sanguinetti sensed the situation and was instantly in the storm center. "What's the matter?" he asked. The teamster told him that he had been crowded out of his place in the service. Meanwhile Steve was eyeing all hands. The teamster was a good customer and a better fighter. "Oh, that's all right. I'll fix you up," the diplomatic host concluded. Bill, there, is in a hurry to get away and he's lost his couteau a la Garibaldi by his rush. I'll get you a special dish of it." Steve went to the kitchen, dug the remains of a hare stew out of Saturday's pots, garnished the platter with lots of toast, olives and parsley and set the ornate dish before the appeased teamster and his beaming lady friend. "That's the star special dish of the day. Nobody loses anything by dining here. Do they, Bill?" and he slapped the clerk on the shoulder. Bill grinned, tickled at this mark of condescension, and content that he had not been disturbed in his act. The mollified teamster believed he had won the fight and as the clerk and his lady arose to leave the teamster could not forego the Parthian shot. "Some hogs didn't get any cooty Garibaldi anyhow: did they Maggie?" Not much," snapped Maggie, glowering at the other woman calmly putting on her feather boa.

Sanguinetti smiled and Peace still perched.

Interest in San Francisco

Some months ago Town Talk received a letter from a friend in London expressing the opinion that in time it would be learned that the April catastrophe had given "greater stimulus to the growth of San Francisco than anything that had ever happened." He formed this opinion, he said, because of the great interest that had been aroused in the city throughout Europe. After the earthquake the magazines published in all the large European cities devoted space to articles dealing with the unique character of San Francisco and the wonderful resources of California, and the state thus received a vast amount of advertising that could not have been bought or procured in any other circumstances. Now comes vindication of the judgment of our correspondent from the California Promotion Committee. "Probably never before in the history of California," says the latest circular issued by that Committee, "has there been such widespread interest in the state, except possibly during the great gold excitement of '49, as is now shown in all parts of the world. The California Promotion Committee has never had such tremendous demand for literature on California and its industries as at present, nor has it ever had such a quantity of inquiries as are constantly coming in from all parts of the world. This demand for information means that during the coming year there will be a great increase of population because these people are making preparations to come to the state to make their homes. Their inquiries have the effect of keeping the counters of the Committee both at its home office in San Francisco and its Eastern Bureau in New York depleted of literature, and it is to the interest of all local organizations to see to it that the Committee is kept well supplied in San Francisco, so that it can always send out literature in response to requests.

The Centers of Population

The California Promotion Committee has been gathering some interesting data respecting population. It reports that on January 1, 1907, California had a population of 2,217,897. Of this number 1,217,064 reside within fifty miles of San Francisco and Los Angeles. Within fifty miles of this city is a population of 875,687 and within the same radius from Los Angeles is a population of 341,378. The business done near the two centers as shown by the bank records is remarkably significant. The bank deposits of the San Francisco fifty-mile radius amount to $378,234,742, and those in the same area adjacent to Los Angeles amount to $106,613,908. The bank clearings for 1906 amount to $2,134,254,146 in the San Francisco area, and $576,689,367 in the Los Angeles area. There are 2,857 factories doing business within fifty miles of San Francisco and 1,631 within fifty miles of Los Angeles.

William Jennings Bryan and Senator Beveridge are having a magazine debate "on Federal control of the affairs of the nation." It is exciting the interest of those that are curious to know which of these famous jawbonesters will have the last word.

"The members of the Legislature appear to have conceived very strong prejudices against newspapermen," says a contemporary. Well the newspapermen have been treating the legislators very unfairly—hitting 'em below the intellect.

A British Beauty at Burlingame

Although the bavardes of the press have given entertaining descriptions of the faultless manner in which Mrs. Charles Clark received the guests who assembled at her husband's private racing track for the polo meet, as a matter of fact Mrs. Clark was not in evidence at any of the festivities which sparkled through polo week. Mrs. Clark has temporarily retired from the social whirl. Her sister, Mrs. Raoul Duval, received the guests. Mrs. Belleville, whose husband is a famous English polo player, has been a house guest of the Clarks and has created quite a sensation by her beauty. She has more vivacity than Englishwomen are generally credited with and her bon mots have helped put a polish on the dreary dinner conversation which usually obtains at Burlingame, "where everyone knows everyone else too well to make an effort at repartee." The Bellevilles are now in Santa Barbara with Charley Clark.

She Has Had Experience

Maud Younger, who is out here on business connected with the Younger estate, helped hand out coffee and rolls on Spotless Town day. The professional dexterity with which she ladled out things to eat differentiated her from the willing but awkward pseudo-waitresses. However, Miss Younger has had the advantage of a variegated experience in New York restaurants, so her professional curves have been acquired at the counter of experience. "The Diary of An Amateur Waitress," which began in the March number of McClure's, is a sprightly account of Miss Younger's experiments. She has been interested in settlement work in New York for some time and has spent the past year wrestling with industrial problems from the workers' point of view.

A Co-ed's Adventure

It has become almost commonplace for a girl suffering from the blight of gilt edge dividends to divert herself of the trappings of affluence and to seek work among the unmanicured. Their experiences, when the local color is scraped off, all show about the same light and shade. I know a Berkeley graduate who recently thought she would like to see the world through the eyes of the kitchen-minded. She managed to get a position as waitress in a Burlingame menage. The butler engaged her in the morning and the Madame discharged her after dinner "because she caught the glint of a gold bracelet under my sleeve she informed me that she did not allow her servants to wear any jewelry." Rather than take off the bracelet which had a sentimental value to her she left. But that one day taught her that there are just as many sets and cliques below stairs as in the drawing-room and the latest recruit to the smart household brigade is made as uncomfortable by her peers as is the social climber by her betters.

Entertained Their Friends at Dinner

A very enjoyable function was the dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. Leopold Michaels at Tait's last Saturday evening. It was an elaborate dinner enlivened with merry quip and banter and White Seal. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Adolphe Roos, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Rotchild, Mr. and Mrs. William Haas, Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Heller, Mr. and Mrs. Sig Stern and Mr. and Mrs. Ackerman.

Their Courage Returning

Society is still talking of the costliness of the wedding presents which Charlotte Wilson received. The Smart Set has evidently recovered from the attack of "poor-mouth" which set in last April and caused multi-millionaires who were reduced to a mere million to practice closest economy. The Wilson-Cadwalader wedding is the first distinctly fashionable wedding since the "late unpleasantness" and the handsome collection of gold and silver with which the bride and groom were showered attests that society has recently taken a "generous powder." The Cadwaladers have leased an apartment on Devisadero near Jackson and expect to move in next month.

They Bought Their Own Gowns

The custom of the bride presenting her attendants with their gowns was not revived on this occasion. Miss Wilson gave the girls who escorted her to the altar bars of pearls about two inches long but they had to dig down into their own pockets for the fluffy pink loveliness in which they were enveloped. Helen, Edna and Georgie Hopkins, and Mary Scott established a record in gown giving which recent brides have shied at. Each of the aforementioned girls had a half dozen attendants, banked by a flower girl or two, and the gowns, hats, gloves and jeweled pins were all perquisites of the performance.

Gone to Gotham For Her Gown

I hear that Anita Harvey has set the fifteenth of April as the date of her marriage to Oscar Cooper. The fact that she has gone to New York to purchase her trousseau and wedding gown has caused a bit of comment among those who consider such an action unpatriotic, especially under the present circumstances. A great many ultra fashionables who never wore anything but Parisian-made have from patriotic motives been patronizing the local modistes this winter and they have discovered that sartorial talent flourishes on this side of the pond. As Miss Harvey is on the spot she will probably have better fortune with her wedding gown than Mary Scott had with the New York creation she ordered for her marriage to Walter Martin. It was a gorgeous gown, the last word on bridal loveliness but—it lacked about three inches from meeting in the back! The gown arrived only a few hours before the ceremony and a well known San Francisco dressmaker had to be hastily summoned to Burlingame to fill in the gap!

There will be a great crush of society people at the opening of the Columbia Theatre next Monday night and after the performance there will be a great crush at Tait's. Nearly every table in the Pompeian Garden has been reserved.

They Shied at the Autos

My Del Monte correspondent writes: Of course much interest centers in the bevy of charming brides now here. As Miss Charlotte Wilson, Mrs. George Cadwalader had been very well known at Del Monte, and on Saturday evening a great many people looked their admiration as this lovely bride arrived. She certainly was a picture in her pale blue broadcloth with a hat of the same color. It had been expected that the young couple would make their tour in an automobile offered them. Indeed, they had the choice of two, but as their friends had decorated the machines with bows of tulles, carnations, heather, and a few old shoes, Mr. and Mrs. Cadwalader preferred to continue their journey in the less picturesque parlor car.

A Planel Performance

Those distinguished French artists, Mrs. Tekley-Planel and M. Planel, will no doubt have a very large audience to entertain at Lyric Hall this Saturday afternoon, for they have aroused considerable interest among the cultured of society and music lovers during their sojourn here. They promise for their farewell performance an unique musicale, and that it will be highly artistic, those that attended their recitals given some time ago feel assured. The programme will include recitations with musical setting by Mrs. Tekley-Planel, the Grande Fantaisie from Faust by Vieuxtemps, the Prelude du Deluge by Saint-Saens, songs by Massenet and several compositions by Monsieure Planel. The performance will begin at 3 o'clock.

Manager Ross Honored

An enjoyable ceremony occurred at the Hotel del Coronado one night recently. Manager Morgan Ross was the central figure. So high is the esteem in which Mr. Ross is held by many of the guests of the hotel who have spent several seasons in San Diego that they decided to present him with a token of their regard. They had a beautiful watch charm made, a Coronado crown set with diamonds. The presentation was made by L. Frank Baum, author of "The Wizard of Oz," who sustained his reputation as a humorist in an amusing speech abounding in encomiums on the genius of Mr. Ross for hotel management.

Wallace Irwin, well known here, is one of the talented trio who are responsible for Raymond Hitchcock's latest success, "A Yankee Tourist."

Dramatic Essentials

"The New York Idea," the play now being presented by Mrs. Fiske, is said to be the best of refined comedies by an American and dealing with American life. Its author is William Vaughan Moody. "The essential thing in the national drama," says Mr. Moody, "is the national spirit, the more or less national point of view. For instance, in our own country, we move and breathe and live in an atmosphere profoundly un-European, profoundly un-English, and equally un-Continental. No foreigner can realize at a glance, or even in a long time, the abyss of difference between the American and the dweller in Europe, even though their civilization be on the same level. Freedom, democracy, the decay of sectarian religion, the endless opportunities of a new country, climate, and the mixture of race have all combined to create a new man, and the new man, the American, has a point of view which in its depth is thoroughly un-European. It seems to me that this is what the national drama should in some way contain as an essential. I am, perhaps, obscure; but consider for a moment the great outburst of dramatic literature which we speak of as Elizabethan. Writers of that time, Shakespeare included, laid their scenes either in a distant time or in distant countries, or both; anything to escape the immediate pressure and Procrustes-bed of a too exactly known state of affairs. They laid their scenes elsewhere in time and place—Greece, Italy, Spain, Denmark, etc.—but wherever their scene was laid the play was rammed with a spirit of Elizabethan England, the spirit of their nationality as well as the especially individual characteristics of each of the playwrights. This will suggest to you what appears to my mind as the idea upon which I should lay most stress; in other words, from my point of view, a play is not like a realistic novel. It may contain all the realism in the world, its spirit may be profoundly realistic, but the business of the playwright is not with the local and temporary details of a given time and place, but rather with the essential spirit of that time and place. Of course, in the comedy of manners this is not entirely the case, and in certain lower walks of the drama which deal specially with locality and depend largely upon slang and the immediate breath of a period, it is also not the case."

Mlle. Fely Dereyne

The Maturing of Nance

Nance O'Neil made her reappearance here Tuesday night at the Novelty Theatre a better actress than when we last saw her. In the matter of technical skill she has so long been defective that we had almost come to consider her intelligence as not on a par with her temperament. But Tuesday's performance of "The Sorceress" impels the conviction that now—and only now—she is attaining maturity in her art. The Sardou drama with its harrowing scenes of the Spanish inquisition and the terrible injustices visited upon the Moors after the conquest of Granada is splendidly adapted to Miss O'Neil's tragic style of histrionism, and she portrays the big-hearted hot blooded Moorish woman with sympathy and magnificent passionate abandon. Her scene of confession of sorcery to the inquisitors in order to save the life of her lover was the very best thing she has ever done and makes her worthy to be classed with the best exponents of the drama of today. Then, too, her beauty of person is quite at its zenith, and her languorous grace of movement makes her a most seductive figure. Her support on the whole is satisfactory, though Mr. O'Meara as Don Henriquez is far from being a felicitous foil to the star. Especially commendable is the work done by Miss Mayo and Miss Vanderbur in their scene before the inquisitors. The production is excellent, and the costuming correct and elaborate.

The Severn, at 1050 Geary street, is a delightfully appointed restaurant.

Melodrama at the Colonial

Piney Ridge, one of the most successful Southern plays ever produced on the American stage, will be presented next Monday evening at the Colonial Theatre. Piney Ridge is a four-act melodrama, dealing with life in the Tennessee Hills, and is replete with stirring situations. The substitution through revenge by an old negro servant of a white infant for a child having a slight tinge of colored blood in his veins forms the thread of the story. The full strength of the Colonial Stock Company will be required to portray the different characters, and the stage settings will be most elaborate. The cast is as follows: General Deering, Norval McGregor; Mark Briarson, G. L. Benneson, Major Jartree, Walker Graves; Israel, a relic of the "ole days," A. Burt Wesner. Jack Rose, from Piney Ridge, Frank Bacon; Zeb Lane, a mountaineer, Wilfred Roger; Rube Holler, R. Peralto Galindo; Azalie Darring, Bessie Bacon; Chlotilda Beverly, Jane Jeffery; Degmar, an octoron, Maud Odelle; Cindy Lane, the outcast of Piney Ridge, Izetta Jewell. "Salome," which has been enjoying a most prosperous run at the McAllister street playhouse, will be withdrawn Sunday night.

Good Comic Opera

"The Wild Rose," now playing at the American Theatre, has caught the public approval with its catchy songs and beautiful stage settings. The opera itself is sprightly and tuneful and in the hands of such artists as compose the San Francisco Opera Company is rendered in a most admirable manner. "The Wild Rose" served to introduce the new tenor Mr. Carl Haydn, who has made an excellent impression. He sings the tenor part and sings it well. Each and all the principals make distinctive hits in their respective parts. The able direction of George Lask is shown in the splendid work of the chorus in the catchy ensemble numbers. They are truly a beauty chorus and are the best seen here in years. The opera will run another week.

The New Alcazar

On Monday evening, March 18, Belasco & Mayer will throw open the doors of their new theatre to the public. It will be without doubt the most modern theatre building in the West. Neither time nor money has been spared to bring it to a successful completion. At the present time the decorators are putting the finishing touches to the interior, which will follow closely the artistic beauties of the original Alcazar of Saville. As formerly, Belasco & Mayer will devote the New Alcazar exclusively to their Stock Company, presenting weekly all the latest successful plays with infinite care. Every effort will be employed to make each production a worthy counterpart of the original. The reputation of the Alcazar has traveled far, and is conceded to be the premier stock organization in the country, and it will be the aim of the management to see that this high standard is maintained. To this end they have engaged a large and expensive company of players. Some are new to San Francisco theatregoers but many of the old favorites have been re-engaged. Laura Lang will play the leading feminine roles. Bertram Lytell will be the leading man and Daisy Lovering, the ingenue. Among the familiar faces will be those of John B. Maher, Fred J. Butler, Will R. Walling, Harry D. Byers, Ernest Glendenning, Walter Belasco, Adele Belgarde, Juliet Crosby and Nera Rosa. Edward B. Lada, who for many years was the conductor of the old Alcazar orchestra, will again occupy the leader's chair. The bill for the opening week will be Madeleine Lucette Ryley's charming comedy of modern society, "The Altar of Friendship," which was originally produced by Nat Goodwin. The sale of seats opens at box office, Monday, March 11.

In the Limelight

"Magda," with Nance O'Neil in the title role, is the Novelty Theatre attraction on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday nights and Saturday and Sunday matinees of next week, the second and last week of Miss O'Neil's engagement.

The most important comic opera star to visit San Francisco in a long time is Raymond Hitchcock, who is to come to the Novelty Theatre on Monday night, March 18, with his very latest hit, "A Yankee Tourist." The piece was recently produced for the first time and San Francisco is to see it before New York. It is the work of Richard Harding Davis, Wallace Irwin and Alfred G. Robyn. The company is a large one and includes, among others, Flora Zabelle, Helen Hale and Walter Lawrence.

"Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" follows "Madam Butterfly" at the Van Ness Theatre, opening on Monday, March 18.

The Rosenthal Farewell

Moriz Rosenthal will give his farewell performance this Sunday afternoon at Christian Science Hall. The programme will include Beethoven's Sonata Op. 101, Schubert's Wandere Fantasie, a group of Chopin works and some Liszt numbers.

The San Carlo Opera Season

Next Thursday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s the sale of seats for the season of opera by the San Carlo Opera Company to be given at the Chutes Theatre will open, and Manager Greenbaum expects to break all records in San Francisco, as the prices are half those usually charged for grand opera, notwithstanding the San Carlo Company is as large and well equipped as any that has ever crossed the continent. The season will open with "La Gioconda" and we shall hear Constantino, the great Spanish tenor; Lillian Nordica, and Fornari, the baritone.

A Bill That Looks Very Good

The bill at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday matinee is certainly an attractive one though many of the clever people it contains we are familiar with only by reputation. May Tully, who heads the programme, is highly thought of in the East as a clever and versatile actress who excels in emotional and character roles. She was recently leading woman at the Madison Square Theatre, New York, and last season appeared at Daly's in one of the Bernard Shaw plays. "Stop, Look and Listen" is the unique title of the sketch she will introduce herself in. It is highly commended by the Eastern press. It was written by Matthew White Jr., editor of the Argosy and dramatic editor of all the Munsey publications. Miss Tully, who will be supported by her own company, will artistically caricature Ethel Barrymore, Mrs. Leslie Carter, Marie Cahill, Ethel Levey and Lawrence Dorsay. The two Olivettis, who are also strangers here, are remarkable characters who appear as Wandering Minstrels or Troubadours of the Old World. They are described as marvelous instrumentalists who succeed in creating that intangible requirement "atmosphere," without which all is lost in modern vaudeville. Johnny Johns, "The Little Man in Black," a natural born comedian, will deliver quaint and funny monologues and Bert Levy, the gifted and popular artist of the New York Morning Telegraph, will depict famous men and famous events. Byron and Langdon, who have created quite a furore in "The Dude Detective," will be retained in the programme and the other holdovers will be The Three Flood Brothers, Quigg, Mackey and Nickerson and Ned Wayburn's Dancing Daisies, accompanying Louise Mink.

Madam Butterfly

What promises to be the rarest grand opera treat of recent years will be inaugurated at the New Van Ness Theatre next Monday night when Henry W. Savage will bring to San Francisco for three performances his new English Grand Opera Company in an elaborate production of Puccini's Grand Opera novelty, "Madam Butterfly." That San Francisco should see so soon a notable success of the character of "Madam Butterfly" should be a source of much gratification on the part of music lovers. It is hardly two months ago that all New York was raving over the beauty and brilliancy of the Puccini Opera. Only recently the opera was given at the Grand Comique at Paris and scored most triumphantly. Rendered in Italian during the London season last spring it was clearly the most notable success recorded in Covent Garden in many years. To Mr. Henry W. Savage belongs the credit for the premier American production and to Mr. Savage also belongs credit for introducing in the more important American cities before it had become threadbare and aged. San Francisco music lovers and dramatic followers will see the original New York cast and production in its entirety. This includes three sets of principals, the chorus and Mr. Savage's own Symphony orchestra of sixty pieces under the leadership of Mr. Walter Pothwell of Vienna, and Mr. Alfred Feith of Berlin.

To a Sweet Soprano.

By Chauncey Townsend

Oh! sing to me forever!—might that be
 I fondly deem I ne'er should feel again
 That sad recurrence of unvaried pain,
 Which words impart not, and no eye can see.
 How much, enchantress! do I owe to thee,
 While thy sweet voice thus weaves the tuneful chain;
 It untwines that which fetters heart and brain,
 And sets the captives of the bosom free.
 Could I repay thee with a verse as sweet
 As thine own melody, the debt were less.
 Not with such hopes my feelings I express,
 But that while plausive crowds thy praise repeat,
 This may perchance more genuine joy impart,
 To know that thou hast soothed one lonely heart.

The American in Other Lands.

By Major Ben C. Truman.

The Parisian of style is so well dressed as to be picked out readily. He is a clean looking, slick looking person, from occiput to toe. He invariably top-dresses himself with a silk hat, rain or shine. His shoes are like mirrors, so excellent have been their polishing. His clothes are always in fashion and well brushed. He seldom appears on the boulevards or at other public places ungloved, and he generally carries a neat umbrella or cane. He never presents himself at dinner in other than evening dress. The Italian, then the Russian, Austrian and German follow in quality and neatness of attire. Continuing the sequence the Englishman comes next, in Paris, although that is not the case in New York and San Francisco, especially in the latter place, where the visiting Briton generally appears monstrously absurd or fantastically and inappropriately "rigged."

Everywhere in Egypt and Europe, however, the Englishman dresses for dinner, but he strides back and forth through the salle a manger with both hands in his breeches pockets.

Coming to the American, he is the least punctillious of all regarding his habiliments, at least on the streets; for nearly every man you meet on the Capucines, the Italiens, Place de l'Opera and Rue Royale with a slouch hat and carelessness of attire is an American. I do not mean that he is shabbily clad or in the least repellant—he is the same American you see going to and returning from business in America, especially in most cities west of the Ohio river; the same American you observe at the race track, at the theater, in the barroom and on the promenade. He disdains the maximum of style—his slouch or derby, his sack or cutaway is good enough for him. At Shephard's Hotel in Cairo, the Grand at Nice, the Cafe Martin near Mentone, Cafe de Paris at Monte Carlo, and Esterel at Cannes—where Englishmen, Americans and other nationalities may be divided into thirds, from December to March—without exception all but Americans attend dinners in either full evening or Tuxedo suits.

But the manners of the American at table are far better than any of those more genteelly costumed. He is less impatient, less robust of language, picks his teeth less and uses his pocket handkerchief less boisterously than the others. In the smoking room or other rendezvous he uses better English than the Englishman; he is more tolerant of the views of others, and is a wittier, better informed person and a much better fellow all round.

But what the American man lacks in excellence of dress—and often of culture—is made up many times over by the American woman—the American girl, I might say. She is simply a trophy of superior womanhood at the dinner table, in the salon, or anywhere. She is intellectually brighter, more intelligent, and has more both of sense and wit. She wears better hats and bonnets in a better way than either the English woman or the Continental. She is prettier of face and figure than the others, and employs less artificial means than any except her English sister, who is always painfully red of face, arms and hands. She is much the best dressed woman in Paris, and decidedly the most attractive, and as she seldom seeks Paris for her health, or for a livelihood, she is looked upon as either rich or independent, which is a factor that further stimulates adulation and regard.

London has of late become such a Mecca for Americans, attracted there by its superb hotels and restaurants, that our countrymen and countrywomen seem to be as thick as berries in and around the first-class caravanserais, in Hyde Park, in Picadilly and Bond street, at the theaters and concert halls, and even on Oxford and the Strand. Here the American man dresses for dinner, and the American woman shows off lovelier and more fetching than in Paris or even in her own land.

Letters

"The Flock"

The sheep men of California assuredly owe to Mary Austin some more substantial recognition for her new book, "The Flock," than a perfunctory vote of thanks. The current belief that a band of sheep will fatten on a barb-wire fence, that shepherds are merely followers after the flock, and that the "woolly idiots" are more destructive than the seventeen-year locust must give way before this sympathetic treatment of a much misunderstood industry, and when next one encounters the dusty figure of the shepherd accompanied by sharp-nosed dogs, trudging behind his charges in the dusk of a warm summer day, it will be with some recognition of him as a man with an acute brain and a large understanding of at least the one subject which most nearly concerns him. What Joseph Conrad had done for the sea Mary Austin has done for the rainless regions of California and the people that inhabit them. Beginning with the introduction of sheep into Alta California in 1770, under the auspices of the Franciscan missionaries, she has followed up the industry of wool growing throughout all its phases and ramifications, not in dry detail and statistical fashion, but with fascinating descriptions of scenery, and a sympathetic interest in her subject. She takes up successively the various duties of the attendant upon the flocks, from the time that the lambs are new weaned and the reluctant or indifferent mothers must be induced by extraneous means to perform their maternal duties, tells of the precautions to be taken against wild beasts, of the shearing of the flocks, the separating of the lambs from the older sheep, the pasturing of the flocks on the open range, the rivalries of the different owners, the devices of the shepherds for securing pasturage, the husbanding of the feed, the maintenance of the men and their charges on the range, and the enmity between sheep and cattlemen. There are some memorable tributes to the intelligence always. The surprising point is that not until Mrs. Austin has presented the subject has it occurred to any one that the men who have trained the dogs cannot have been of such an inferior order of intellect, else they could not have imparted understanding to their canine assistants. The chapter on "the sheep and the forest reserves" throws new light on that subject and raises the question whether it is equitable to destroy a thriving and necessary industry which will affect the welfare of many in order that a few alien tourists may feast their eyes on meadows and wild flowers. In "Rancho Tejon" there is revived memories of the pastoral days of California, when there was time enough and to spare for all there was to do, and incidentally there are many stories concerning "the Manxman," Sanger, Don Jose Jesus, Little Pete, and many others. It would be a pity to have such a volume as this relegated to the rubbish heap by labeling it a "nature book." Rather let it be called the shepherd's calendar, and given place in the section reserved for books of especial value. Illustrations are by E. Boyd Smith and bear an intimate relation to the text, not merely pretty pictures to be looked at. "The Flock," the price of which is $2, is one of the most attractive volumes that have appeared this season. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

More of Dan Monroe

"Two Cadets with Washington" continues the story of Dan Monroe, whom boy readers will remember as the drummer boy of Lexington. The new narrative takes up Dan's career just after the battle of Bunker Hill, and carries him through the evacuation of Boston. deference to the wishes of his family, but Dan himself becomes an important and useful member of General Washington's staff. His local knowledge, combined with a clear head, good powers of observation, and a spirit of daring without recklessness make him a valuable messenger, and he is made a cadet at headquarters. Dan soon found a new chum to his liking in the person of a lad who had followed a detachment of Virginia sharpshooters, running away from school in order to join their ranks. This new companion proves to be a namesake, also a Monroe, who, later on was to fill the presidential chair itself. Boys who are beginning the study of American history will learn of the disorganized, undisciplined state of the so-called "army" with which Washington had at first to deal, and perhaps they will be as much surprised as their hero was himself to discover that in spite of his experience he was no great soldier yet, though the further history of his career may reveal him in officer's uniform. W. O. Stoddard is one of the best-known writers of boys' books of this day. He can make even this trite subject interesting. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

Another Revolutionary Juvenile

In "Polly of the Pines," Adele E. Thomas has achieved a novelty on a rather threadbare theme. The book is a juvenile of the American Revolutionary period, but instead of the trite little New England maiden whose mind was made up from the first, and whose experiences concerned Lexington and Concord and Bunker Hill, Polly was a little Carolina girl of thirteen who found enough difference of opinion amongst her friends and relatives for her to do some sober thinking on her own account. Polly and her simple-minded brother Jamie were orphans. Their mother was of Scotch descent but their father had been an American. Now, Mr. Dunning himself had been a patriot, but then, many who had stood with him in earlier times were now King's men, and then, too, there were all the Highlanders who had left England because of their disagreement with one king, raising the standard and pointing in the rising to favor another. Besides, there was Flora MacDonald, the very Flora of Skye, who had compassed the escape of Bonnie Prince Charlie, a heroine for any little girl, much more one of her own family, to follow. But Polly Dunning's doubts were speedily solved and she became herself a heroine, seeing the war on both sides, nursing the wounded, carrying messages, and making herself very useful indeed. With her, young readers will make the acquaintance of Marion and Sumpter, and see General Tarleton, the scourge of the Carolinas. They will learn as much about that part of the Union as they now know of the North, and share Polly's joy in the escape of her playmates, the recovery of her brother, restored to health, and the end of the war without the fulfillment of Tarleton's boast that the well cultivated farms of her patriot friends would become the ducal seats of the successful British generals, rewards for their successful services. Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

Exponents of Chafing Dish Cookery

A dictionary is not less indispensable to a scholar than a reliable book of recipes to a housekeeper, whether the house be a mansion with a retinue of servants or a bachelor's menage, with only a chafing dish in lieu of a range, and there is art and knowledge requisite to even so simple a task as boiling water for tea. An especially attractive compilation of chafing dish cookery and salads has just been put forth by the H. M. Caldwell company. They are the choice selections of Louis Muckensturm, his own and those of two other chefs. All can be readily prepared, as they are designed for small parties of three or four, where the concocting can be made

There are twenty-four ways of preparing eggs, thirty-eight salads, twelve sandwiches, and nine sauces described, besides the relishes, canapes and miscellaneous dishes, in addition to the hints on carving, the care of materials, how to make a bill of fare, and other essential bits of wisdom. Blank pages for private additions are left at the end, and the long, narrow shape makes the book a convenient one to handle. #### "The Mirror of the Sea"

Unlike most of the authors who have achieved a reputation for style, Joseph Conrad gives substance as well as carefully chosen words. His style, like that of Professor Henry Van Dyke, is the least obvious thing about his writing. It never obtrudes itself but one is subconsciously aware of its perfection because his works make such easy reading. There is never an involuntary inclination to reconstruct his sentences or substitute a better word for the one he has used. His recent book, "The Mirror of the Sea," was written with the design of introducing to landsmen certain phases of life at sea which, though familiar to sailors, are seldom touched on by writers at all, and then, but inadequately. In fact, they are aspects and angles of vision which are revealed only to the initiates, and there are but few of them who are expert enough with the pen to set them down in writing. Mr. Conrad, despite his Polish birth, is no inland voyager. Following the sea was his chosen occupation, and as master and man, he learned to know ships and the element in which they exist in every variation of mood. He remembers

"The black wharves and the ships,
And the sea tides tossing free
And the Spanish sailors with bearded lips,
And the beauty and mystery of the ships,
And the mystery of the sea"—

remembers them lovingly though he does not forget "the true sea, the sea which plays with men until their hearts are broken, and wears stout ships to death. . . . Open to all and faithful to none, it exercises its fascinations to the undoing of all." Your true seamen can never be brought to look upon a steamship as anything but a machine. The sailing vessel, propelled by the winds and currents, answering to her helm, and responsive to her sympathetic captain and crew, is to him something more than a mere bulk of wood or iron. She is, in the words of our author, "a sensible creature." Every vessel afloat has her own characteristics, and though she may be the exact counterpart, in every line and measurement, of half a dozen others, she yet will differ from them in her actions as certainly as the children of the same parents assert their varying individualities. Mr. Conrad has all the love and enthusiasm of an artist, and the criticisms which he launches against those impressionistic scribblers who misuse sea terms are enough to make hardened water-front reporters blush for their ignorance. The titles of the chapters are most alluring. "Of Landfalls and Departures," "Cobwebs and Gossamer," "Rulers of East and West," "The Grip of the Land," "Emblems of Hope," "The Fine Art of Sailing," "Overdue and Missing" brings home the dumb tragedy of the lost ships no trace of which is ever yielded. They are simply gone, with all hands, how, no one may ever know, nor when. Glimpses of biography, bits of characterization, scenes of storm and disaster, hopes and fears and realization, are interspersed with description. Published by Harper and Brother.

tain Mary had been crying. Now, in the Dinkey collection of manuscript poems there is one which can relate to no other conceivable incident of the poet's life, and, if the truth were known, Mary probably had a copy of it in her possession the morning after that stroll. It is a fond, foolish thing, which the Foothill Bard would hardly have perpetrated in his younger and better days, but it goes far toward confirming the suspicion of Miss Jellison that there had been a tender scene between Mr. Dinkey and Mary that day.

YOU.

Pluck me a flower, love, here beside the brook,
That harebell of your eyes' own heavenly blue,
To press between the pages of life's book,
That I may skip the sadder ones and look
At these sweet passages which tell of you.

Only a month! Your namesake month, sweet May!
To me it is an epoch, dating anew
The record of my life. I cast away
Both anno Domini and natal day
For this glad era that I met with you.

To this bright season of my love shall hold
All after seasons, many they or few;
Thus I shall say, when I am gray and old
And some fond story of this time is told,
It happened in the golden year of you.

O that the angel stood on sea and land
Sounding the trumpet that shall bid adieu
To time, now—now, while lovingly we stand Together here—that I thus hand in hand
Might wander through eternity with you!

Look up and smile once more, love, ere we part;
I fain would see you through this rain of tears
As if a heavenly rainbow bent athwart
Your face. One kiss, for pity. Now let your heart
Wrap me in cerements, as mine buries you.

All this was at the beginning of the season, but there presently came a change. One very hot day there arrived two very cool young men—Armand Edouard Emile Louseury, of France, and James Houston, son of General Houston, the eminent San Francisco jurist. The former was ugly as sin, but his name stood high in the French peerage; the latter claimed no title, though belonging to the horse-and-dog-show aristocracy, but he was handsome as Apollo. They had come to visit the Kirbys and Jellisons, the heiresses of which opulent houses were naturally thrown into a great flutter and began spreading their allurements like two little peacocks.

Poor Mary beheld James Houston, and the peace that had nestled dove-like in her bosom spread its wings and flew away. A sensation she had never felt before shot through her heart, and a feeling of forlornness came over her which made her wish she had never been born, or had died before realizing such wretchedness.

But time went on all the same. One sweltering hot day the aristocrats were sitting on the veranda, where a slight breeze was stirring, when the bell rang for luncheon, whereupon Alice Kirby cried out:

"Oh, let's have our lunch out here!"

"Yes, yes," seconded Carrie Jellison, "it will be so nice."

"A kind of fete champetre, eh?" said Prince Louscurvy.

"But it will be a great deal of extra trouble, and Mary, poor girl, is already overtasked," interposed James Houston.

"Well, I declare, Mr. Houston! I didn't think you would be sticking up for her," retorted gentle Carrie.

"She!" exclaimed sweet Alice; "it's her business to wait on us."

"Certainly," assented the Prince; "we pay, and are to be accommodated."

"But we might be a little accommodating ourselves, and not overwork a poor waitress," protested Mr. Houston.

"You're too ridiculous, Mr. Houston!" cried gentle Carrie. "She's hired to wait on us, and wait on us she shall. Here, Mary! Mary! Mary!"

In response to the shrill summons Mary presently appeared upon the veranda.

"We want our lunch out here. Get a table and set it for us," commanded gentle Carrie.

"Yes, Miss Jellison," replied Mary, and withdrew.

"She knows she has to do anything we tell her to," complacently remarked gentle Carrie.

Presently Mary was seen struggling with a table, endeavoring to get it onto the porch. It was heavy, and she was at disadvantage trying to handle it alone. They were all watching her. After a moment's hesitation James Houston arose to assist her, but before he had taken a step Mr. Dinkey appeared, saying, "With your permission, Mary," and helped her carry and place the table.

"I don't see why that old fool should always be busying himself with her affairs," said Carrie, when Mr. Dinkey and Mary had retired.

"He's stuck on her," responded sweet Alice.

"Well, he must have mighty little sense to be stuck after a piece of trash like that," concluded the amiable Carrie.

"Hush, Carrie!" implored the mother.

"I won't hush," replied the gentle darling; "she's a nasty, designing, upstart thing!"

James Houston gazed with a far-away look at the distant mountains, and even the Prince forbore his usual plaudit of the young lady's sentiments.

Mary spread the cloth, laid the covers and served the luncheon with her customary quietness, but a little tremulously. In her nervousness she let a dish slip, and was declared by gentle Carrie to be a clumsy, butter-fingered thing. By an uncontrollable impulse Mary looked appealingly straight into the eyes of James Houston, and was met by a return look so tender, so sympathetic that it wrung from her what her torturers could not, for tears were streaming from her eyes as she turned and hurried away.

The screen-door was opened for her by Mr. Dinkey, who exclaimed:

"Mary, you are weeping! Has any one insulted you?"

"No, no," she replied confusedly, "it is nothing—only I can't bear it as I used to."

"That impertinent old ass again!" shrilled gentle Carrie. "I wish he was dead!"

The misery of it all for Mary during the succeeding days! Since that too, too kind look from James Houston the feeling in her heart had become an almost unbearable anguish, the sense of forlornness an agony so keen it seemed at times that she should die of it. For, though kindness always shone in his eyes, it never again flashed out as on that occasion. It was veiled, guarded. She saw that he had recognized the distance between them and would not cross it. She was out-classed and beyond the pale of his love.

Why couldn't her parents have bequeathed her millions instead of a heritage of shame? Why couldn't she have had silks and laces and jewels instead of a calico frock and nothing more than a flower for an ornament? Why couldn't she have been gifted and schooled in every grace and accomplishment instead of being a poor untutored waitress? He might have loved her then; but now—oh, it is too terrible to bear!

And the poor bleeding heart, instead of hyssop or myrrh to soothe its ache, found only wormwood and gall. For the gentle daughters did not overlook or forget Mr. Houston's interest in their victim; and, though her immolation had been determined upon from the start, they conducted it thereafter with a refinement of torture. Just a specimen scene:

The delectables were all at the cool spot of the veranda again. It was but a few steps to the huge granite basin into which the cold water of a spring flowed, with a drinking-gourd hanging beside it. But there were no torture-appliances connected with the fountain.

"Bring me a glass of water," shouted Carrie through the open window to Mary, who was arranging the tables in the dining-room.

Without hesitation Mary left her work and did as bidden. Now, whether from real fondness for flowers or from an intuition that they became her, Mary had that day pinned a rose to her breast and tucked an additional bud into the coils of her hair. The daughters detected the extra adornment with cat-like quickness, and their lips curled into a sneer.

"Well, I declare, how smart we have got ourself up to-day!" cried gentle Carrie, instead of thanking the poor girl for her humble service.

"She is certainly setting her cap for you, Prince; you must look out or she will capture you," exclaimed delicate Alice.

"Haw, haw, haw! Good joke—very!" roared the Prince.

"No, it ain't the Prince; it's Mr. Houston she's after," asserted Carrie. "She saw the other day that he's inclined to be sweet on her, and she's playing the game for all that's in it."

"Miss Jellison, I trust you will respect the young lady's feelings if not mine," said Mr. Houston.

"Lady! Feelings! Well, that is a joke, Prince; isn't it?" retorted Carrie. "I guess I was nearer the truth than I suspected, Mr. Houston, when I said you were inclined to be sweet on her. After all, it would be very convenient to have a waitress for a wife; it would save trouble about help."

All this was fired at Mary while she stood waiting to receive back the glass. Embarrassment seemed to have paralyzed her. Just then Mr. Dinkey appeared at the window, and said:

"Mary, will you kindly do me a little favor?"

His words broke the spell. Putting her apron to her face she burst into tears, and hurried back to the dining-room.

"That old ass! Will he never die!" exclaimed gentle Carrie, as she saw her victim snatched from the grid-iron.

Nevertheless she was tolerably happy, for she had given the quivering soul a pretty good grilling before the rescue came.

All human affairs reach a pass that compels solution—whether we scheme toward the result or whether it come about unawares, sooner or later every trouble must end—happily or otherwise. Mary's perplexities had reached that stage. The unhappy girl longed that James Houston should love her; or, if that could not be, that she might die. There was nothing else she cared for. Even the cruelty of her tormentors did not wound her now. All other feeling was swallowed up by her great passion; for if she was never to be happy in her love, nothing could add to that misery.

One thought ran on through her brain, sleeping or waking, till the monotony of it became distracting: was there nothing she could do to win James Houston's love? It couldn't be by any display of accomplishments, for she had none. It couldn't be by any exhibition of finery, for the millionairesses had a monopoly of that. What could it be?

The question was to be decided by blind fate, so called—but, to my thinking, about the most clear-sighted thing in the world.

Mary was in her attic bedroom, after the day's tiresome work, with the more tiresome haunting thought for a companion. The world had lately become so gloomy to her. It must always have been a gloomy world, in fact, for there never had been a time when someone had not loved as hopelessly as she. Then she remembered having read that in ancient times the love-lorn Greek girls sought to learn the outcome of their passion by burning a lock of their hair and noting the omens of the smoke. Who could say such divination might not come true? At least, it could do no harm, and any kind of action was better than this useless thinking. She would try it.

James Houston had lighted a cigar and began his customary round of the veranda that night a little later than usual; for the millionairesses were in high feather, and Miss Alice had opened her batteries in dangerous proximity to his heart. But during all the siege visions of the patient girl he had seen trampled daily under the feet of the delectables passed before him, and instead of listening to the beleagueress he found himself wondering if the hereditary, moneyed or dog-show aristocracies amounted to much after all, and if it were not true that "Kind hearts are more than coronets,

And simple faith than Norman blood."

Preoccupied by these problems, he had made the round of the veranda several times when he was startled by a shriek from above, and saw at the same time a glare on the trees fronting the hotel.

The cry was an inarticulate one, but he knew intuitively who had uttered it, and felt that it was a direct appeal to him.

He was up the two flights of stairs instantly, it seemed to himself; but, quick as he had been, Mr. Dinkey was before him, shielding Mary and smothering the flames from an overturned lamp in her room.

When the fire was extinguished and the danger over, Mary fainted, of course—and, of course, she fainted in James Houston's arms. While carrying her to another apartment he encountered most of the guests of the hotel, who had collected in the hallway. And he encountered also this reception from Miss Alice:

"So, Mr. Houston, when there is peril you can think of a servant and forget me—me, a Kirby!"

And this from Miss Carrie:

"Doesn't he look heroic, with the waitress' head pillowed on his breast!"

"Where, she and God willing, it shall always rest as tenderly and beloved as now," replied James Houston.

"Your hand on that," said Mr. Dinkey. "For your sake, young fellow, I forgive the whole tribe."

Clear-sighted fate had solved the problem for Mary. The guests one after another retired, to grieve or rejoice over the solution. All but Mr. Dinkey. He had never missed harnessing an event to verse, and could not do it now. Morning found the journalist still sitting by the little table in his room. A sheet of paper lay before him on which he had scribbled something, and he sat staring at it gloomily as if it were a mortuary bequest he was about to make effective. But it was only this—the swan-song of the Foothill Bard:

NOCTURNE.

I sit and wait; the night grows late;
Will no one come? Will no one come?
The lovers throng about the gate,
They meet, they cling, they separate;
They turn, they kiss, they hurry home;
But no one comes to me, who wait.

No one will come I'm old, I'm old;
Love's sunset has no afterglow;
The lips that clung to mine are cold,
The arms that circled me are cold—
God bless the buried loves! I know
I am a laggard from the fold.

In the Matter of the Estate of } No. 2513.
LEWIS MEYERSTEIN, }
Deceased. } Department No. 10.

JANE I. MEYERSTEIN, Executrix of the last Will and Testament of Lewis Meyerstein, deceased, having filed herein a duly certified petition praying for an order of this Court authorizing, empowering and directing her to join Edward S. Rothchild in renewing a promissory note in favor of the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, dated April 22, 1902, for $150,000, upon which there remains unpaid $154,690, and to secure the payment of such note by a mortgage to the said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society of that certain property owned by said Edward S. Rothchild and said estate, as tenants in common, and situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and more particularly described as follows, to-wit:

COMMENCING at the intersection of the northerly line of Geary Street with the easterly line of Grant Avenue, and running thence easterly along said northerly line of Geary Street forty (40) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles northerly and parallel with said easterly line of Grant Avenue sixty (60) feet; thence at right angles easterly and parallel with said northerly line of Geary Street nineteen (19) feet and six (6) inches; thence at right angles northerly and parallel with said easterly line of Grant Avenue sixty-two (62) feet and six (6) inches to the southerly line of Union Square Avenue, formerly St. Mark's Street; thence at right angles westerly along said southerly line of Union Square Avenue, formerly St. Mark's Street, sixty (60) feet to the easterly line of Grant Avenue; and thence at right angles southerly along said easterly line of Grant Avenue one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet and six (6) inches to the said northerly line of Geary Street and point of commencement.

And it appearing therefrom and otherwise that the renewal of said note and making of said mortgage is for the advantage and best interest of said estate,

IT IS ORDERED that all persons interested in said estate appear before this Court at its Court Room, Department Number Ten (10) thereof, at Temple Israel, northeast corner of California and Webster Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, on the 8th day of April, 1907, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, then and there to show cause why the said prayer of said petition should not be granted and the undivided one-half interest of said decedent's estate, together with the undivided one-half interest of said Edward S. Rothchild in and to said premises be mortgaged to secure the payment of said promissory note for the sum of $154,690, to be renewed as aforesaid, or for such lesser amount as to the Court or Judge shall seem meet.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, that notice to all persons interested in said Estate of Lewis Meyerstein, deceased, be given by publishing a copy of this Order for at least Four (4) successive weeks in the Town Talk, a newspaper printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and hereby adjudged to be a newspaper of general circulation.

For all further particulars you are hereby referred to the petition now on file herein.

Steffens the Philosopher

To Mr. Edward J. Livernash we are indebted for some interesting revelations on the subject of that industrious muckraker Mr. Lincoln Steffens. Mr. Livernash, who is himself better than a raw hand at muckraking, has a fellow-feeling for Mr. Steffens and it was delightfully pervasive of the page or so of the Bulletin that was devoted to the prose poem descriptive of the distinguished magazine reporter, his physical charms, his magnificent achievements and his exalted purposes. Mr. Steffens, we learn from Mr. Livernash, looks "the man of distinction." He is "of graceful build and easy carriage," and notwithstanding his masterly exposure of the unutterable shame of unspeakable cities, "his manner has the charm of simplicity." Fame has not made Mr. Steffens overbearing; not, at least, toward a man of the rank of an ex-Congressman. "Finally he is an engaging talker and a careful listener." Who would not be a careful listener within reach of the silver tongue of Mr. Livernash? But the disclosures respecting the physical and mental characteristics of Mr. Steffens are not half so significant as certain other revelations, chief among which is that of the principal aim of his existence. When Mr. Steffens was at Berkeley he found himself asking himself in long primer caps, WHY IS IT WRONG TO STEAL? He asked the professors and they couldn't tell him. Which is, perhaps, the worst swat that was ever taken at the Berkeley faculty. He went to Europe to have his riddle solved and studied philosophy at all the leading universities but futilely, and finally turned to physiology and biology in which studies he "got a glimpse of the growth of things—a glimpse of something in nature having to do with selection—a glimpse of evolution applied to conduct," and he came away satisfied that he "should not bother about ethics but should investigate morals" in "the workaday world." Now that we know that Mr. Steffens is something more than a mere muckraker, that he has a taste for philosophy, he bulks larger than heretofore in our esteem, though we must admit that we have always loved Mr. Steffens for his muckraking; much has he done toward bringing the country to an apprehension of the evils by which its integrity is menaced. But in exposing his abiding crotchet he lets us know that he is absorbed in the profound problems of life, and that he is intent upon rendering more important service to mankind than can accrue from the abatement of ephemeral abuses. Like all serious men Mr. Steffens is tangled in a snarl of interrogation points. He realizes that, as Kingsley puts it, we are set down before the greatest world problem—given self to find God, and he keeps a little fountain of inquiry bubbling and splashing in his brain. We bid him welcome to the circle of the elect, rejoicing the while to know that he is casting his luminous and penetrating mind into the very midst and marrow of ethical science. We feel that he will bring to bear a comprehensive knowledge and a rigid logic. From what Mr. Steffens has said we apprehend that his purpose is to find a new basis for morals. The search will afford him a deal of entertainment. The question, Why is it wrong to steal? is one of the mysteries of life, and in such a world as this where it is desirable to be entertained and not always easy to find entertainment, there is a great deal to be got out of a discreet consideration of these mysteries. One reason why it is wrong to steal is that the world would not be a good place of residence if we did not play fair and pay attention to the rules. To understand clearly why this is so one must be familiar not only with biology, but with all nature and its reciprocal and hostile relations, and last but not least one must realize that there are certain rules and laws which are not dependent on the fancies of men but which are imprinted in the substance of the soul. So far Mr. Steffens has not made much progress as a philosopher. His assertion that he turned to biology for enlightenment as if he had pioneered a new trail, indicates that he had not even familiarized himself with the works of the sages, for it was in evolution that most of the dryasdust metaphysicians sought confirmation for their logical deductions which were scarcely sprung before they became superannuated. There is no study more deceptive than that of moral science. Familiarized from infancy with the language of this science, surrounded by its continual applications, and having before our eyes the truths under a palpable form we have the rashness to think it would not be difficult to master its highest principles. And the error of most philosophers is that they start out with preconceived notions respecting the source of morals and in adapting their logic to the attainment of the conclusions desired, their minds are seduced by the charm of metaphysical subtleties and they cease to listen to the voice of the human heart. But we have no misgivings respecting the fate of Mr. Steffens who is now pursuing truth in the workaday world.

The Press and the Legislature

The latest gathering of California's lawmakers may well go down in political history as the Newspaper Session, for never since the birth of this golden commonwealth has a Legislature so lambasted and worried the press as have the solons who are now seeking their homes with the consciousness of duties well performed, and never within a like period has the press agreed so unanimously in exposing, baiting and denouncing the Legislature as during the sixty days that are just past. It has been a bitter fight, stubbornly waged every inch of the way with neither combatant seeking or giving quarter but pounding unmercifully until the din of battle set every mouth agape from Siskiyou to San Diego and from Tahoe to the sea. To maintain an attitude of diplomatic neutrality and at the same time to avoid definite commitment to the merits of either feudist, it would behoove us no doubt to declare that the victory was strictly of the Kilkenny kind, to pretend that the newspapers have gobbled the Legislature and that the Legislature has devoured the newspapers. But of a verity there is more of the pallor of paradox than of the ruddy light of truth in such a decision, for the legislators, by scattering to the four corners of the state, have disrupted that united front which was their principal source of power and which enabled them to face the journalistic onslaught without panic; whereas the newspapers can continue to batter them as effectually as though they were still massed in the halls of legislation. It is true that the legislators have set in motion against their editorial enemies the patient but overwhelming machinery of the law, but lacking in many instances the gubernatorial backing on which they so confidently counted, the restless pulse and whirr of their legal engines are not likely to affright in anything like the degree that was intended. Every time during the session that a journalistic barb found its appointed victim, the tortured one soothed his pain with the cheering thought that he had put his revenge into the statute books, but too often he was fooling himself with an empty consolation.

Exclusion, Diatribe and Assault

From the opening to the closing day of the session there was no cessation of hostilities. Beginning with the revolutionary procedure of excluding, first a newspaper writer and then the entire staff of a daily which had dealt it some of the most stinging and resounding whacks of the session, the Legislature has displayed ingenuity of no mean order in devising novel methods of punishment, finally winding up, ingloriously it must be admitted, in the dying hours of the session with a physical assault on one of the most vitriolic of its journalistic censors. The use of physical force as an expression of resentment is a survival of medievalism so flat, stale and unoriginal as clearly to indicate in this instance that the teeming resources of the Legislature were exhausted and that a lengthier session would not have brought to light anything else in the line of noteworthy legislative warfare. Violence as applied by a Los Angeles senator to a representative of the Times was neither beautiful nor artistic. This final blow at the press carried the disappointment of anti-climax, too, for from the use of rhetoric to the application of fisticuffs is a far and a backward cry. But between these extremes it cannot be denied that the Legislature managed to crowd a variety of punishments for its enemy that must excite the academic admiration, if not the sympathetic appreciation, of all who enjoy good fighting. What body less skilled in the infliction of dire torments than the Inquisition of old could have devised the expedient of wracking the newspapermen with unending hours of oratory so dull, prosy, futile and boresome that its continuous flow maddened the helpless victims and drove them to the verge of paresis? What so cunningly calculated to stab the literary minds of the correspondents who must perforce submit to the torture or neglect their work as the atrocious puns, the mangled grammar, the vulgar slang and the hopelessly tangled figures of speech wherewith the legislators purposely garnished all their remarks? Mere ignorance, of course, could never go so far among men chosen from their fellows to make the laws of the state; it was done consciously, without a doubt, the good taste, lively wit and jovial humor, polished diction and correct address of which the legislators could under different conditions be such graceful exponents being deliberately sacrificed for the purpose of punishing the Juniuses of the press.

Restrictive Legislation

Of the mere direct denunciation that characterized each day of the session it boots not to speak. Suffice it that nearly every lawmaker had his separate fling at the papers, peppering them with such showers of oratorical shot as would bring down, one would think, any game at which it was aimed. That it did not lay low every newspaper in the state argues no lack of skill in the legislative huntsmen but merely the unconscionable thickness of the editorial hide which refuses to be punctured by anything short of the heaviest ordinance. Perhaps it was in realization of this peculiarity of newspaper proprietors that the Legislature quite early in the session charged itself with the pleasant task of so sewing them up in restrictive laws that they would be forced henceforth to publish journals as impersonal and innocuous as the most conservative papers in Great Britain. Hence the law making libel a felony to be punished with fine and imprisonment; hence too the law forbidding papers to discuss the issues at stake in a civil or criminal action lest, forsooth, they influence or intimidate the susceptible jury—the “straitjacket law,” as its author not too modestly described it. Others there were which need not be resurrected here. Designed, some to worry individual papers, others to bait news associations, they have died the death, chloroformed in committee or strangled at the Governor’s desk. It is all over now for two years; the dun clouds of the legislative fire are being dissipated in the airy spaces, but the newspaper bombardment continues and might last, for aught there is to stop it, until the thirty-eighth session of the Legislature is convened. Armed with the damning evidence of roll-calls (the weapon which La Follette of Wisconsin found so effective) the papers are still insistent that the voters shall know

Saint Patrick

As time runs on the Irish are getting nearer the truth respecting the achievements of St. Patrick, but they are not in need of facts to strengthen their devotion to the memory of the man whose "day" they are about to celebrate. The life of no great man for whom a people have transcendent admiration is shrouded in greater obscurity than that of St. Patrick. So vague are the outlines of his life that by many he is looked upon as a myth; and the Irish have been ridiculed for revering a mere legendary hero, but this passionate devotion of the people of Ireland to the memory of St. Patrick is an expression of one of the noblest traits of the national character. It is the sentiment which Carlyle calls hero-worship, the germ of Christianity itself, the ultimate perfection of a principle extant throughout man's whole history on earth. It is that poetic faith in the intangible which cannot be eradicated out of men's hearts, which no sceptical logic can destroy. But that in St. Patrick the Irish have a hero worth revering is a fact that has been well established by scholars distinguished in historical research. Though the literature about St. Patrick does not begin until the seventh century, more than two hundred years after his death, proofs of the principal events of his career are no longer lacking. Patrick was born in Britain in 389. His father was a Roman decurion and a Christian deacon. Carried as a slave into Ireland after an Irish raid on Britain, the boy tended sheep in Connaught and meditated on religion. He succeeded in escaping to Gaul, and took up his abode at the monastery of Lerins, the island opposite Cannes. After a visit to his kinsmen in Britain he went to Auxerre, where he received ordination from Germanus. Meanwhile an unsuccessful mission had been conducted in Ireland by one Patricius or Palladius, who has been confounded with Patrick, and who had been sent to Ireland by Pope Celestine. After the death of this missionary, Patrick was allowed to achieve his ambition, and was consecrated bishop for the conversion of the island of his captivity. After traveling through much of Ireland he died at Saul (not at Downpatrick) in 461. Patrick made Latin the ecclesiastical language of Ireland, and brought the island into the community of the Latin world, so that during the next two centuries Irish churchmen were able to play an important part in the affairs of Europe. There are in existence today his Epistle to Coroticus, a British chieftan, and a Confession, documents of great interest, which have been examined by scholars and pronounced genuine.

One Brand of Socialism Repudiated

To what are the municipal ownership propagandists devoting their energies nowadays? We have noticed that of late they have not been so lusty-lunged as of yore. The volume of their chorus has been considerably diminished. Their demands for experimental tests once were continuous and uninterrupted, but are now intermittent and the pauses are steadily increasing and becoming more and more protracted. It was but a short time ago that municipal ownership was proclaimed the panacea that would alleviate all our political and economic ills. The Evangelists of the new dogma were as enthusiastic as the early Christians and they were making converts throughout the length and breadth of the land, but they are showing signs of weariness and many of them appear to be wavering in their faith. This is unfortunate; for as yet there has been no satisfactory practicable demonstration in this country of the merits or demerits of municipal ownership. The question of its virtue under our form of government is a purely academic one. We can base our estimate of it on nothing more substantial than the experience of foreign communities. And though conditions in those communities are said to be more propitious than those which prevail in this country yet municipal ownership where tested has hardly come up to the expectations of its socialistic proponents. In London where the people for eighteen years have been constantly broadening the policy of municipal ownership, it has been repudiated. Never in a great community has there been such an extreme reversal of the popular will with regard to party or policy, as that which took place in London a week ago on the occasion of the County election. The socialists who have been in control were put to rout and the policy of municipal ownership was the sole issue of the campaign. Even in the communities dominated by labor constituencies the Socialists were badly beaten. The campaign against municipal socialism was the keenest political struggle in the modern history of the metropolis, and it was the first time in years that all London turned out to vote. It should be explained that the extension of municipal industrial enterprises created such a large army of public employees, that it became necessary to arouse public sentiment as it had never before been aroused in order to defeat the mammoth political machine that had grown up under the beautiful system which has been so ardently advocated in this country.

Nocturne

By Wilfred C. Thorley.

Lie still and wake not her sleeping quires;
Lie still and wake not her wild desires;
The sea sleeps here, and like lilies faded
The limp flags droop from the tangled spires.

For no winds shake them; all dews were dried
Long since ere the crimson sun had dyed
The pallid west till the clouds rode golden
And glassed serene in the tranquil tide.

The languorous wind is salt of scent,
And all the wrath of the waves is spent;
The lighthouse isled as a lonely sentry,
Looks out where river and sea are blent.

Aloof on the gray, one screaming gull
Gleams ashen pale as a dead man's skull,
And sails as light as a floating wafer,
Till starless haze and the night annul.

A church has stood for a thousand years
Betwixt the land and the lightless piers;
All silent slumber her tongueless gargoyles
And taut with a horror of stifled tears.

A warping windmill with sails awry
Throws two vain arms to the vacant sky;
And clouds droop low as a weary eyelid,
To dusk the light for a weary eye.

The wind moves listless among the ships;
A song of slumber is on his lips.
The ocean steeds have the wind for driver;
When will he waken and seize his whips?

A chill sweet spirit no flesh defiles,
A child in slumber that dreams and smiles,
The sea is suave and the foamless ripples
Follow and flutter her breast for miles.

Perspective Impressions

Keeping an eye on Ruef is the most congenial job that Biggy ever fell into.

Judge Dunne should feel so grateful for the liberal education he is getting these days in criminal law as to be inclined to give Ruef and Schmitz the benefit of every reasonable doubt. But it's a wise judge that knows a reasonable doubt when he sees one.

It is the theory of a bunch of Boston doctors that the spiritual heft of a man is about an ounce because he loses about an ounce of weight when he dies. Perhaps Boston will now proceed to change the vernacular. Let us not be surprised if the vulgar expression, "loss of life" falls into disuse in consequence of the substitution of the more elegant phrase, "loss of an ounce."

Who was the brilliant lawyer that advised Abe Ruef to make manifest the bias of the sheriff and the coroner?

It is announced that Alfred Austin is going to write a poem on the Jamaica earthquake. A little ginger from that country might serve as an admirable substitute for the divine afflatus in Austin's case.

The Sacramento Bee admits that Sacramento, since the last removal scare has done little more than make moves toward improvement; also, that some of her leading citizens "invest their money elsewhere," "deprecate investments" at home, and "fear to lend money" at home, while "others expect to retire before long and live elsewhere." Pretty good stuff that for the Berkeley boomers to use.

Puccini and Verdi

By G. F.

Giacomo Puccini is the latest idol of American music lovers. And as usual with Americans when they have an idol, they have made Puccini the object of hysteric adulation. The composer of "Madam Butterfly" came to this country a few months ago to assist in the production of his opera and he was immediately put upon a pedestal and worshiped. New York raved over "Madam Butterfly," and pronounced Puccini a legitimate and worthy successor to Verdi. This same opinion was voiced in London after Covent Garden had enthused over "Madam Butterfly." The judgment of Covent Garden in musical matters is accepted as infallible in New York, and to that fact is largely due the prestige in this country of several feminine howlers who are accepted in the American provinces on the strength of their Metropolitan Opera House successes. In the musical centres of Europe the musical taste of London is known to be vulgar, and even the competent English critics acknowledge that Covent Garden is without artistic sense. One of these critics, Harold E. Gorst, remarked not long ago, that the success of "Madam Butterfly" at Covent Garden was without significance; that it meant nothing beyond the fact that the Italian opera season has become a recognized factor of fashionable life in London, and that the relief from the tedium of the higher class German opera is sincerely welcomed by the bored patrons of guinea stalls. Of far greater significance than the reception accorded the opera at Covent Garden is the fact that the first performance at La Scala was such a fiasco that the composer, as soon as it was over, took umbrage and marched off with the score to prevent its repetition. This was the first verdict of his own countrymen who are certainly not open to the charge of failure to appreciate his talents, and whose standards of musical criticism belong, it will be generally acknowledged to a higher plane than those of the bored fashionables of either British or American society. Now it is not my purpose to pick flaws in "Madam Butterfly," but merely to protest against its composer being ranked with Giuseppe Verdi, whose works are today the backbone of the immense popularity of Italian opera in this country. There are passages of considerable beauty in "Madam Butterfly," but no one would think of comparing it with Aida, whose whole musical fabric is splendidly interwoven with Oriental coloring. With what success did Puccini introduce Japanese color into the music of "Madam Butterfly?" It is said that he obtained some Japanese melodies from the wife of a Japanese Ambassador. If so he passed them through an Italian crucible before adapting them to his libretto. There is a suggestion of their origin in the score but it is somewhat faint. We perceive the color of Japan with our eyes rather than with our ears. The opera abounds in atmosphere but the bulk of it is in the libretto. However it is a fine work admirably suited to the taste of the theatre-going majority and worthy of the respect of musicians. That Puccini possesses great talents as a composer it would be absurd to deny, and his countrymen may well be proud of him as a writer of popular opera, but he has not yet entered Verdi's class. In Verdi's operas may be found all the elements which combine to make interesting and vital the creations of such writers as Puccini, Mascagni and Leoncavalla. Verdi is one of the loftiest figures in music and the theatrical brilliancy of Puccini pales before the refulgence of the Master's genius. The Puccini worshipers remind us that when Puccini composed Madam Butterfly he was ten years younger than Verdi was at the time that "Aida" was produced. It may be well to remember also that before reaching Puccini's present age Verdi had written "Rigoletto," "La Traviata," "Trovatore" and several other of his most popular operas; also, that Verdi's musical genius asserted itself while that of Puccini was the result of cultivation and slow development. Verdi's father was an innkeeper. It was a strolling fiddler who discovered his genius and it was in the face of the most discouraging circumstances that he received his training. Puccini came from a family devoted to the art of music, and when only six years old, the age at which Verdi was punished by a priest for neglecting, in the absorption of listening to the organ, his duties as acolyte, Puccini was being coaxed to take an interest in music by a loving mother. Puccini received encouragement from the beginning. Verdi was discouraged at every turn. Puccini has written some popular operas, Verdi, keeping pace with the progress of modern music, revolutionized Italian opera and in his extreme old age when he might well have been contented to rest on his laurels he wrote his astonishing "Falstaff," which is destined to hold a permanent place as a classic of lyric art. Perhaps the genius of Puccini has not yet reached its efflorescence, but it is hardly probable that he has capacity for the great achievements that must yet vindicate his talents before he can justly claim equality with the immortal composer of "Otello." Verdi wrote twenty-seven operas, a few romances and songs, two odes, one quartet and the famous Mazzoni Requiem. He was distinguished as a patriot, a philanthropist and a man of pure and simple life. He gave to the world enduring masterpieces of opera that are ranked among the best examples of Italian art.

The Truth About Japan

By Robert L. Taylor

Literature relating to Japan has been growing very rapidly since the fall of Port Arthur. Europe has become very curious respecting the character of the nation that triumphed over Russia, and numerous writers have been responding to the demand for information. Within the last year Californians too have been taking greater interest in the people of Japan, and to satisfy my own curiosity I have been delving into such current literature as gives promise of enlightenment. First I have sought to learn something of the religion of Japan, a subject on which there is great divergence of views. One of the best books containing information on the subject is "Shinto, The Way of the Gods." The author is Mr. W. G. Aston, a distinguished member of a small group of scholars to whose industry the world is indebted for much scientific knowledge of the history, religions, statecraft and language of Japan. Mr. Aston was the first scholar to elucidate the formidable intricacies of the grammatical structure of the Japanese language. He is the author of the standard work on the literature of Japan, but nothing that he has written is more thorough than his exhaustive exposition of the mysteries of the Way of the Gods, the indigenous cult of Japan, the alleged foundation of much of the patriotism, energy and altruism of the people. No part of his subject has escaped his notice, and his materials are arranged in a logical sequence which makes them clear even to a casual reader. But the book is not for casual readers. It is for the scientific students of humanity who take more than a passing interest in the inner life of a people interesting in themselves and made more so to us by political alliance. They will find in it separate chapters on the general features of Shintoism; on its deification of human beings, beginning with the sovereigns, which has been fallaciously regarded by many European scholars as one of the greatest sources of its pantheon; on that pantheon as it actually exists; on its history, the morality which it teaches, and on its ritual; and the whole is preceded by a list of the native authorities from whose work Mr. Aston has obtained the material for his own; the number of them is in itself testimony enough to the wideness of his research. Shintoism as compared with the great religions of the world is, Mr. Aston says, perhaps the least developed of all which have an adequate literary record. According to one of the early American missionaries it is, as a religion, hollow, empty and jejune beyond any other that is known among men. It has no bible, no dogma, no moral code of its own. It has neither heaven nor hell, no system of reward or punishment after death, no regular ceremonial worship, no priesthood whose lives are exclusively devoted to its services, and the deep earnest faith that is so marked a feature among devoted followers of other religions, Christian, Mohammedan or Buddhist, is never found among its adherents. And yet it has exercised a deep influence on the history and character of the Japanese people. Its foundation lies in the belief that the islands of Japan were the first formed in the world out of the infinite space that prevailed before the origin of all things, when neither heaven nor earth existed, and that the sovereignty of those islands was subsequently conferred on the direct ancestor of the Mikado who was himself the near descendant of the Gods of Heaven. From this belief springs the fanatical love of all Japanese for their country, the land of the gods, far above all others, and the reverence for the sovereign, which not only secures the most unquestioning acceptance of every decree which his infallible wisdom promulgates but ascribes to his virtues every glory that is won by the arms of his soldiers and sailors. In every household in Japan, from the palace down to that of the humblest peasant, Shinto altars find a place and prayers are offered before them every night. Every Japanese is at birth placed under the protection of a special tutelary Shinto deity, and no matter how poor he makes at least one pilgrimage in his lifetime to the temple of Ise, the Mecca of his faith. How intense is the national regard for those temples may be assumed from the fact that one of the greatest leaders of modern Japan, one of her greatest statesmen, was assassinated a very few years ago because he had profanely touched the curtain of the altar with his walking cane, and the memory of his assassin was not execrated but lovingly cherished to a degree that amounted almost to canonization. A cult which has such effects among a quick-witted, materialistic people can hardly be the rapid thing which, in ignorance, Europeans have been accustomed to hold it.

Another excellent work on the subject of the religion of Japan is from the pen of Okakura Yoshisaburo. It is a reproduction in connected form of a series of lectures given by the author to the University of London and is entitled, "The Japanese Spirit." According to this scholar, whose opinions are naturally prejudiced, Japan has been urged on her career of progress by the unwritten code of morality known as Bushido, or the path of the Samurai.

Wherever we look for the keynote of the intrepid valour shown by the soldiers and sailors of Japan, our eyes will, he says, invariably end at the magic path of the Samurai. Believing that the Spirit of Japan is to be found in that code, he traces all the elements that have contributed towards its formation, beginning with a sketch of the supposed origin of the people, of their place in racial science, and of the mythological history of their early days. Buddhism was introduced into Japan from Korea in the sixth century of the Christian era, and gave a vigorous impulse to the study of Chinese literature principally as exemplified in Confucian texts. The philosophy of the great sages, Confucian and Lao Tsze, exercised a strong effect on the formation of Japanese character, but it is in Buddhism that one of the two main sources of that character

Hugo and His Juliette

By Lewis F. Laughlin

Nowadays people appear to be constantly alighting in the haunts of the famous dead. In London there is scarcely a street that cannot be associated with a poet or novelist or his cousins and aunts or with one of the mistresses of Charles II or the first or second George, every scrap of unpublished matter, every possible association of a great writer with his neighbors and neighborhood, every item of what once was his worldly possession is brought to light. Shakespeare and Shelley,

VICTOR HUGO

Dickens and Thackeray—is there the smallest trifle ascertainable about them that has not been given to the world? How will their editors of the future continue to throw a ray of new light on the subject? It is the same in France. Public curiosity respecting the doings of the immortals cannot be surfeited. I was reminded of this phenomenon some time ago, during my travels, when I came across a mine of information about Victor Hugo. It was in the Isle of Guernsey, to which had fluttered the little colony of exiles which he had joined after the Coup d'Etat of Louis Napoleon and his sham Republic. Among the exiles was one Paul Stapfer who became a sort of Boswell to Hugo and took exact and copious notes of his conversations with the great writer upon all sorts of subjects. He recently published a book in France which has the value of a new work by Victor Hugo. It contains the interesting intelligence that Marius, one of the principal characters in "Les Misérables," was no other than the author himself. But Stapfer did not get out of the Guernsey mine all the rich ore that was accessible. Long after the departure of Stapfer there was found in the Hauteville House, the Hugo residence in Guernsey, the "journal intime" or diary of Francois Hugo, son of the poet and a set of love letters from Hugo's mistress, Juliette Drouet, to the "Lord of Human Tears." The journal is not of much value. It is a mass of personal chronicle and abounds in trivialities, but there are many references to Victor Hugo and his conversations are occasionally quoted. As for example he is represented to have said while discussing his enemies among the critics of Paris:

"I admit candidly I defend my friends and attack my enemies. Whatever may be the faults of Theophile Gautier now, I defend him. I remember and will always remember that after the failure of 'Le Roi s'Amuse' all my enemies triumphantly fell upon me, saying that never had such an execrable production been presented. Theophile Gautier, who was then writing for a small journal, wrote in regard to 'Le Roi s'Amuse': 'If we lived in a time when there was any respect for poetry, Victor Hugo, crowned with laurels, should ride in a golden car drawn by four white horses before all the people of Paris.' Yes I defend Gautier. I defend even Mery. I am profoundly grateful for good, and profoundly hurt by evil. I defend my friends to the last, until the day when it is proved they are not my friends. On that day I become their enemy."

Of Eugene Sue, Hugo is represented in his son's diary as having expressed himself as follows:

"The other day I read a novel by Eugene Sue in the 'Nation,' called the Jouffrey Family. It is extremely vulgar and bad, and written in the style of a porter, but it is most striking in its reality."

One day Julie Hugo, in an argument with her brother Charles, cited Marcus Aurelius as an example of kingly virtue.

"Ah yes," said Charles, "he persecuted the Christians."

Here Victor Hugo intervened:

"Marcus Aurelius was no angel, but he had a rare mind. The philosophy of Marcus Aurelius surpassed Christianity, which, however, has rendered a greater service to the heart of mankind than to the human mind. Marcus Aurelius was a philosopher, a Socratist. If he had been told of the mysteries of the Christian religion, he would have regarded these mysteries as superstitions. His mind placed him on a higher level than his material position. He was higher than his time."

One day Charles Hugo pronounced marriage an infamous institution. "Charles," said his father, "you throw yourself forward like an ox to break down gates opened by me twenty-nine years ago. In your talk, too often you reclose gates you had previously opened." As this conversation occurred in 1852 Victor Hugo could not have been more than twenty-one when he "opened the gates." He was twenty-nine when he met Juliette Drouet. He was only twenty when he married and he had three children at the time of Juliette's conquest. He first met her when she was assigned to the role of Princess Negroin in his play "Lucretia Borgia." Eight years later he wrote in her album—a little book called "Livre— de l'Anniversaire": "Dost thou remember, my beloved, our first day? It was the time of Carnival in 1833. There was being given at some theatre a ball to which we both were to go (I interrupt my writing to imprint a kiss on thy sweet mouth, and then I continue). Nothing, not even death, I am certain, can ever efface that recollection within me. Poor angel what beauty and love is thine! Thy little apartment was full of adorable silence. Outside we heard Paris singing and laughing, and the masked revellers passing by shouting. Amid the great general festival we had set apart and concealed in the shade our own sweet festival. That day I spent eight hours with thee. Each of those hours has already given birth to a year. During those eight years my heart has been full of thee, and nothing will change it, thou knowest, even should each of those years bring forth a century."

But Victor Hugo's fidelity was not rewarded. Juliette was unfaithful, but the author forgave her and their devotion endured precisely fifty years. His wife, who died in 1868, was for thirty-five years conscious of Juliette Drouet's part in Victor Hugo's life. Juliette shielded him in his escape from Paris disguised as a laborer, followed him into exile and made for him and his intimates a world of gaiety on a quiet little island. During Madame Hugo's life she never abated her devotion to her husband, whose genius, in her fond eyes, absolved his every weakness. In exile he took breakfast with his wife at the Hauteville

House and dined at the petit salon of Madame Drouet just around the corner. But to come to the letters. Two of them will suffice to indicate the general tone. They were written during the troublous times of Hugo's political misfortunes. The first is dated March 31, 1851:

Thursday evening, 9 o'clock.

I return to you, my beloved, with that confidence and ardour that springs from mutual love; without any rancour for the past or anxiety for the future, with the sweet and delightful cohort of my illusions, with all my strength and all my soul, therefore be forewarned! I shall not speak to you again of what I have suffered, but I will remember throughout eternity your ineffable kindness and divine meekness. I no longer see your fault but only feel your love. I will not ask whether my image on your heart is mutilated, but I know that on mine you are complete, very living, beautiful, great and sublime. I know not whether my happiness will ever resume its first form, but I am certain I have no other belief, nor any other divinity than you. All the despair that has shaken my heart during the last month has not shaken from it that marvelous fruit of love, enlarged and ripened by all the sap of my admiration for you for nearly nineteen years. I feel its roots deeper and more living than ever in the middle of my heart, and even my tears, far from injuring them, have revived them like refreshing rain.

JULIETTE.

The following is dated September 19, 1851:

Friday evening, 11:30.

Not a day goes by now, my poor darling, without bringing some new violence against thee and thine. It is enough to make one's blood boil and to excite indignation of all good people. Don't fear that they can shake me, my beloved, for my courage flows all the more with their persecution against you. I will be worthy of you and no human power can lessen my devotion, and no danger can make my love afraid. What I felt just now was not weakness or fear, but indignation and disgust against those mean, cowardly and vile persons who are so ferocious and violent,

Whenever they have brutal force they could have no other, nature having denied them greatness of mind. Let me pour out my indignation, my darling, against these infamous scoundrels who have the audacity to attack you, the noblest, most generous, greatest, most devoted and disinterested of men. Having given vent to my anger, there only remains my admiration for you, my tenderness and love, all that makes the heart great, good and happy. Goodnight, beloved; go to bed as soon as possible and enjoy the sweetest sleep, lulled by my good wishes.

JULIETTE.

This sweetheart of fifty years, beloved embodiment of the poet's human ideal, whose charms so long enslaved him, this beautiful, magnetic friend of that great Frenchman whom the world has enshrined, lies in an unmarked grave under two flat stones! And in curious agreement with this rude fact is the other fact that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the Museums of France and England do not contain Juliette Drouet's portrait, nor can I find that it has ever been published.

The people of Guernsey cared naught of the unconventionalities of Hugo's career. They remember him only as a great and good man, who was kind to children and had many eccentricities. They remember that he used to bathe on the roof of his house and could be seen performing his ablutions in the morning. One of the amusing Guernsey anecdotes is told by a Guernsey stationer. In "Les Travailleurs de la Mer" you will find the picture of a Scotch Highlander playing the bagpipe. Throughout the novel the author calls the musical instrument a bug-pipe. When the Guernsey people remonstrated with him, the poet insisted that bug-pipe was correct and refused to alter it. The controversy was vigorously pursued, especially by those in Guernsey who sprang from the north country and who did not purpose submitting to a burlesque upon a musical instrument which was so much a part of their national life. "Monsieur Hugo, you are wrong," they protested, "there is no such word as bug-pipe. It is bagpipe—bagpipe—bagpipe—bag —!" "It is bug-pipe!" retorted the poet, "because I, Victor Hugo, poet, dramatist, peer of France, etc., etc., say so. What I write becomes right because I write it." There are still to be found in Guernsey people, who, as children were proteges of the great writer. He used to give them luncheons in his yard, and he always sampled the dishes to see that they had been cooked according to his theories of l'art de cuisine.

The Notable Case of the Marquise des Esbroufettes

Englised for Town Talk by Beatrice Hastings.

The elegant and fashionable Madame de Vigier, superb in amethyst velvet, and silver fox, had scarcely seated herself, with her two admirers, de Foy and de Courtenay, in the Cafe des Roses, when who should arrive but the Marquise des Esbroufettes; as usual she entered the grill room, like a fluttering bird, or as de Foy put it, like a young cyclone, fresh from the western prairie, yet looking decidedly charming in a smart, cloth tailor-made gown, relieved by a touch of point lace, and old rose satin, her blond pompadour, topped by a velvet toque, with the most alluring of plumes.

She ordered tea and toast, and with a deep sigh, prepared to unfold her harrowing tale.

"Something sensational, I'll wager," whispered de Courtenay to de Foy.

"Decidedly sensational," echoed the pretty Marquise, who had overheard de Courtenay's stage whisper.

"Ah! if you only knew, the experience I have had," she continued, excitedly. "However, I am well satisfied, for Monsieur Grujand, will get his deserts."

"And, who is Monsieur Grujand?" asked de Foy.

"My landlord," blushing responded the Marquise, "though I'm really ashamed to acknowledge him. But then," she added with a pretty pout, "I'm certainly not to blame, for how could such a poor little unprotected widow become cognizant of such facts."

"Certainly not," came the gallant response from the gentlemen present.

"But," urged one of them, "proceed, Marquise, with your story, for the introduction is a trifle nebulous."

"Well, to begin with I must tell you, that some time ago I gave up my apartments, in the rue Murillo, as I found them rather small, and too far away from the theatres—a great disadvantage, when one is compelled to accept an escort; a very necessary appendage, I may observe, and I grant agreeable, for a short distance, but when the journey is long, one's escort is apt to become a bit enterprising, which ruffles one's pompadour, one's chiffons, and one's temper."

The gentlemen smiled audibly at this announcement, while Madame de Vigier arched her dark eyebrows, significantly, and she glanced across the table, at her dear friend, the Marquise, as though she too had experienced the disadvantages of long journeys with enterprising escorts. Not in the least ruffled by the slight interruption, Madame des Esbroufettes, continued her story, with renewed volubility, her thin pink lips moving at auto-speed: "I therefore determined to secure apartments near the Boulevard; and one day passing the rue Saint Georges, I saw a beautiful house, which apparently had just been renovated; as frequently happens, in such cases, the entire mansion was vacant, and to let. The vestibule was large and spacious, the candelabrum superb, the staircase imposing; in a word, I visited the apartments on the first floor, just newly decorated, and was delighted with them. The drawing-room was magnificent. From the concierge I learned that the owner's name was Grujand, and that he lived in the rue de la Chaussee d'Anten. I rushed to see him, thinking, as I walked along, that as his entire house was to let, he would be suave and accommodating. I found Monsieur Grujand, a very old man, with a seamed and shrivelled face, his thin white hair surmounted by a velvet cap, his manner harsh and rude, and apparently the most fastidious of landlords. 'Are you a widow, Madame?' he asked bluntly. I answered in the affirmative. Then followed a string of questions: 'How long has your husband been dead? Have you any children? Do you entertain much? From whom can I make enquiries?

Schmitz's Latest Triumph

Back to his native heath came our vulpine Mayor last week with heart fuming in spleen, midriff palpitating with canicular rages; back came he to twiddle the fingers of scorn in the patient face of an outraged community. In a spirit of triumph the Mayor returned. For had he not obtained what he went to Washington for? Had he not in his possession a certificate of character from the High Priest of Organized Labor? More important than the exclusion of the Japanese. Poor silly fool! so successful has he been in his gasconading that he imagines he can play the Janus-faced role forever without being detected. Little does he know of the forces that are operating for his destruction. Scarcely had he removed the stains of travel before he began exuding corroboration of my assertions of last week in reference to the deal made at Washington. A most unsavory deal was that; to suggest all the terms of which would be to put too severe a tax on credulity. Besides I am rather incredulous myself. But in the sequence of events is presented a damning chain of circumstances from which President Roosevelt, if charged with having designed the conspiracy, would find it somewhat difficult to extricate himself. The history of President Roosevelt's relations with the Storers exhibits some very reprehensible traits of his character, but I am loath to argue that they gave prescience of the extent to which he merely appears to have gone in the indulgence of iniquitous expedients for the attainment of his imperative ends. In the exigencies of high office statesmen are sometimes constrained to reconcile with duty a suspension of the code of higher ethics, and Mr. Roosevelt may not have at all times squared his performances with his noblest professions, but it is hard to believe that he bargained with Schmitz in a way designed to blow the breath of life into that political corpse. Whatever may have been Mr. Roosevelt's transgressions, it is nevertheless universally believed that he is an exemplar of all the civic virtues. We all know that for nothing has he greater aversion than a corrupt public official. The star-eyed goddess of reform is his tutelary genius by right of discovery. It is therefore inconceivable that even to extricate himself from the embarrassment incident to the Japanese imbroglio he would deliberately put Schmitz in the way of obtaining a certificate of character for the deception of the voters of San Francisco.

The Wily Gompers

That, however, he did so play into the hands of Schmitz, there is not the slightest doubt. Of course he may have done so innocently. Nevertheless he cannot very well escape the odium of having given aid and comfort to the man who, he well knows, is responsible for the degradation of this city. And it may be remarked parenthetically that while President Roosevelt may have had no inkling to Schmitz's designs the Mayor's friends in this city knew pretty well when he went to Washington that it was to obtain a certificate of character from one Samuel Gompers. It would be interesting to know by what species of necromancy Schmitz saw the deft hand of Gompers in the background of the White House conference. Schmitz and Gompers were not friendly. When Gompers visited this city two years ago he kept aloof from Mayor Schmitz and herded and banqueted with those union leaders by whom Schmitz was repudiated on account of his demoralizing influence on organized labor. Mr. Gompers openly sympathized with the men who were then and who are now engaged in trying to remove the Schmitz incubus from the body politic. Now it appears that Mr. Gompers is a dexterous acrobat. One might suspect him of turning a somersault when Teddy presses the button.

A Wonderful Eulogium

An endorsement and a certificate of character from Gompers constituted a prize for which Schmitz would have paid a gaspipe thug's ransom. The prize was accessible for the asking. And O, what a dazzling certificate the shifty Gompers gave him! So eulogistic a tribute to his worth was never before paid to our whiskered Mayor. And it must be admitted that in his time Mr. Schmitz has been giddied by many a preposterous panegyric. The intemperate Gompers fairly staggered him with encomiums. It was immediately after the White House conference that the apotheosis of Schmitz took place. When the wine began to flow the bald headed prophet of union labor took to his feet, lifted Schmitz from the mire where he has been helplessly floundering and transported him to the pantheon of Great Men. It was with several type-written copies of the address that Schmitz returned home to confound his enemies and justify his theatric air of triumph. It was a mistake not to publish it. It was so obviously written to order and for a purpose that it is hardly likely to excite anything but derision even in labor circles. But hearken to the tinsel clink of compliment, the gurgle of the smooth, insinuating oil of flattery: "I feel," said Prophet Gompers, at that remarkable banquet by which the deal was consummated, "that we are in the presence of a great man. I say this despite the bitter, and the malicious statements of his traducers. Falsehood and calumny will not, and cannot, detract from the greatness of the things done by him, by his direction and in his name at a time when the very world stood still with the horror of the calamity which had befallen the city which has thrice honored him with the office of mayor."

Greatest Achievement Since the Civil War

Now we must admit that's fine stuff from the oratorical standpoint. From these introductory words we learn that Mr. Gompers understands the local situation. He knows that Mr. Schmitz is being traduced and calumniated. He uttered enough in that strain to fill a column dwelling principally upon Schmitz's great achievements during the fire, and charging that the men whose hospitality he accepted while here two years ago are engaged in a conspiracy to jail Schmitz in order to crush union labor. He referred briefly to the street railway strike and gave the Mayor the credit of having won it. This should please the ear men immensely. Then he credited the Mayor with having won the President over to a Japanese Exclusion policy. "I want to say here and now," he added, "that in the matter of Japanese exclusion Mayor Schmitz has done more for the country and particularly for the working men, and in less time, than anything else done in the interest of labor as one proposition, since the Civil War." After assuring his hearers that it is the habit of his life to speak with deliberation this exuberant demagogue resumed: "I want to pay my tribute of respect to the Union Labor Mayor of San Francisco. We know that the opponents of union labor are forever seeking some little speck upon the character and makeup of the man of labor, so that by applying to it the most powerful magnifying glass, even though such a glass may cost $100,000, they may so enlarge it that it will become sufficiently visible to be subject of criticism. They are ever seeking the mote in the other man's eye. Their method is apparent. It is not that they hate the representatives of union labor the less, but that they hate union labor itself the more."

The Story of a Promise

I have been told that while Schmitz was in Washington he was promised that Gompers would come to San Francisco to take the stump for him in the next campaign. Feeling quite certain that there will be no campaign so far as Schmitz is concerned, I merely present the story for what it is worth in the same spirit in which I have narrated the circumstances of the infamous piece of political sculduggery by which Schmitz earned a certificate of character at Washington. In whatever light it is viewed one must regret that the President of the United States ever deemed it his duty to dicker with Abe Ruef's side partner and put him in the way of obtaining a clean bill of health from the blatant demagogue who slandered those brave citizens that are engaged in an honest effort to redeem a graft ridden city from the clutches of the most vicious and shameless gang of scoundrels that ever debauched an American community. Of course Gompers is powerless to rehabilitate so ragged and soiled a personality as that of Schmitz or to perpetuate conditions that have rendered the name of San Francisco even in Europe, as Current Literature tells us, "inseparable from an abominable odor of moral putrefaction," but it is somewhat startling to find a man wielding the tremendous influence that has been put in his hands, prostituting his power to so base an end.

Omar Philosophy for Christian Consumption

The Rev. Dr. Evans, of Grace Church, I hear, has plunged the members of his congregation into a very lively dispute over the question of the propriety of rounding out a sermon in a Christian Church with a paraphrase of the Rubaiyat. Dr. Evans recently closed a sermon with the verse beginning "A book of verses underneath the bow," and made a slight addition:

—and thou, O Christ,
Beside me singing in the wilderness—
Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow.

This treatment of the sad, glad Persian is thus commented on in a letter that I received the other day: "The Doctor's amendment will no doubt set the unregenerate old Tent-maker aright with the unpoetical orthodoxy, yet with what a perversion of the spirit of Omar. For, in reality, this is one of his most pagan expressions. It is the hopelessness of it all, the vanity of struggling against destiny that would drive our old poet into his symbolical wilderness, where he would mock existence in busying himself in the few compensations of a transient life—books, good cheer and good friends. Still, the Reverend Doctor means well. He at least gives a cloud and a harp to the most essentially un-Christian man that ever wrote verse."

An Equivocal Bard

But how does my correspondent know that the Rev. Dr. Evans has been guilty of a perversion of Omar? The old Persian as well as Browning is susceptible of many interpretations. Like Ibsen he has interpreters representing many phases of opinion. By some it is said that he exalts the gratification of the senses above that of the intellect, and one of his biographers tells us that his epicurean audacity caused him to be regarded askance in his own time and country, but there are other views and stories relative to his sentiments and his position among his contemporaries. Many of his quatrains are unintelligible unless mystically interpreted. It is believed by some critics that he was something of a saint and that the Rubaiyat is a poem of great philosophical, ethical and religious influence. Perhaps Dr. Evans believes that it was not the juice of the grape that Omar celebrated; convinced, perhaps, is he that Omar was a mystic who shadowed the Deity under the figure of wine. Having devoted his life to an equivocal psalmody Omar has no one to blame but himself for the liberties that may be taken with his songs.

Our Frolicsome Statesmen

If the sense of humor argues the possibility of ultimate salvation the legislature that has been in session during the past two months is not so hopelessly damned as some of its bitter enemies would have us believe. For the perception of humorous situations and the appreciation of the ridiculous, even when they involve unflattering commentaries on its own wisdom, sufficiency and splendor this lawmaking body and especially its upper chamber exhibits a jovial and sincere readiness that is not only surprising but disconcerting. Let the joke on its august self be never so broad and its implication never so embarrassing, it will still pay its devoirs to the goddess of quips and cranks with hearty laughter. Its sportive humor will not allow of anything being taken too seriously. "Go to," it says in effect, "your legislating is a dull pastime at best; let us lighten it with jest and gild it with smiles, else will we be bored to death." And so, when men like Caminetti and Sanford and Curtin would fain be serious for a time, it votes them down in a gale of guffaws; and when the smiling countenance of Belshaw is drawn into stern, unyielding lines, it scents a new sort of jesting and ha-has him out of his Catonian humor. Even when Willis of Redlands, "the mocking-bird of San Berdoe," as Belshaw felicitously nicknamed him, rises majestically to frown his fellows into severe, unbending consideration of some weighty measure, even then the Senate persists in its holiday gaiety and lends him only a grinning, mocking attention.

The Majestic Willis

Willis is the Beveridge of Sacramento; he is obsessed with the necessity of showing a stern front to the awed spectators of the legislative gallery and he resents the perennial cheerfulness, the settled nonchalance of his seniors. "We are the source of all the wisdom of the state," he cried in a frantic effort to impress the law-makers with the awful responsibility of their positions. But instead of being impressed the irrepressible fun-makers drowned the rest of Willis' speech in waves of bubbling laughter. "I represent one-fifth of this great sovereign state," declaimed Redlands' representative on another occasion. Yet the legislators, so far from being awed by the moral and geographical burdens which he carries, only sought to lighten them with indecorous but wonderfully healthy cacchinations. "I have learned more in the last sixty days than in all the rest of the thirty-five years of my life," was another statement of this young statesman which moved his hearers to strange, irritating glee. And so on every possible occasion. When Willis concluded an eloquent tribute to the inspiring influence of sun and sky and flowers with the assertion—"Why, everything is done here by inspiration," the invincible humorists around him twisted his rhetorical posy into a cryptic innuendo and simply roared with mirth. If old Burton were privileged to return to earth he would find nothing in this legislature to yield new material for the Anatomy of Melancholy, but for that part of his immortal work which deals with correctives of the bilious temperament there would be such a wealth of illustration as would swell it to twice its bulk. No wonder, considering the comic humor of our legislators, that our statute books impress so many as little better than jesters' manuals.

Soreness of Anderson

Not for many years will some of the animosities that have been aroused by the capital removal scheme be assuaged. In the case of ex-Lieutenant Governor Alden Anderson, I doubt whether he will ever forgive some of the men behind the removal gun. Anderson is one of the newcomers in Sacramento, and he has acquired large interests there, for Anderson has become a very rich man in the last few years. Anderson was a moving spirit in one of the new enterprises to which I have referred, and since the removal proposition came up the enterprise has been hanging fire. So it is not to be wondered at that Anderson has been in something of a rage. Some of the most active of the removal agitators were his intimate friends until a few weeks ago. He was identified with the Republican machine, a circumstance tending to belie the charge that the removal project was of purely political significance. As Jere Burke and John Lynch were among the Berkeley boomers it was assumed that they represented the machine, but the fact is that both are enthusiastic residents of Berkeley and have large interests there. It is hardly probable that the Southern Pacific is interested in the project since it is one that more directly concerns the Key Route company. The Southern Pacific would be more likely to favor San Jose or Alameda.

In the Divorce Court

The every-day incidents of the divorce court are subjects that might well impel the pen of a Balzac or a Zola. The judge whose term, or period, as presiding judge has just expired has placed himself on record as one in favor of the reconciliation of disgruntled mates and as an upholder of the marriage relation. The present presiding officer, Judge Coffey, while he has a poor opinion of women as witnesses, and professes to be opposed to the institution of marriage, nevertheless makes it a point to assign the majority of divorce cases to his predecessor, Judge Graham. Possibly,

No matter what his front presents,
He still is filled with good intents.

"You want this divorce case assigned to some particular department, I presume," said Judge Coffey the other day to an attorney who was presenting the papers.

"Oh, I'm not particular," returned the attorney, fancying that a disclosure of favoritism would kill his choice.

"Well, you know that I am not an avowed advocate of marriage," said the judge with a sly twinkle; "but Judge Graham stands as an upholder of it, and I'll assign the case to him."

"According to your own ideas, you couldn't do worse for my client," retorted the attorney.

"Well," answered the judge, "a good cause will find its own support."

"And doesn't need me," continued the attorney.

"Hardly," said the judge.

The Trial

Then the case came up before Judge Graham on a motion for alimony and counsel fees, and the judge insisted on both plaintiff and defendant taking the witness stand. The intent was to effect a reconciliation if possible. She was shrinking, mild-mannered, pale and twenty; he forty, swarthy and with the swagger of a brigand.

"What's your nationality?" inquired the judge of the woman.

"Swiss," said she.

"And yours?"

"Persian," said the man.

"A bad combination, isn't it?" said the judge, looking at the attorney for the plaintiff.

"It couldn't win," said the attorney, thinking for the moment of the last one he played, and taken off his guard.

"He treats you cruelly, does he?" asked his honor of the woman.

"Yes, and makes false charges against me."

"I never did," interjected the defendant.

"Any children?" asked Graham.

"Two, but they're both dead," whispered the woman.

"She killed them, Judge," muttered the man savagely.

"Listen to that accusation, Judge," remarked the attorney.

"You better set the case for trial at an early day," concluded his honor.

And then when the case came on for trial, the defendant with her witnesses disclosed a chapter of life in the refugee camp lasting from the day after the earthquake until late in September. The defendant had money in the bank—several hundred dollars,—all through that period, but they subsisted upon the charity of the city. Then a child was born to them. It lived only three months, and the father allowed its body to go to the dissecting table and then to the Potter's field. And his deposit in the bank was all the time increasing. When the case was submitted the judge said: "Madam, your husband ought to be tarred and feathered, if what you say is true. No, more than that, he should be first tied to the whipping post, if we had one, and then the hot tar applied. Decree granted."

Thompson some years ago how he fooled the literati with his meaningless, nonsensical outpouring of mere words under the name 'Yone Noguchi.' Thompson made a long story out of the hoax and related that the clever Burgess greatly enjoyed the adulatory criticism that the stuff evoked. I do not know whether Burgess pulled down the Cogswell fountain, but I do know that he is not the first to claim the credit of that achievement. And by the way I do know that he did not pull down the last of those awful effigies. One of them disfigured the entrance to the Cogswell school at Twenty-sixth and Folsom streets until the earthquake of last April when it was converted into formless junk."

She's Married Now

Up from Honolulu came the following verses written by Hilary Neil Weston of the Star, apropos the sentiments of Governor Carter respecting his freedom from prejudice against Japanese sons-in-law:

I am married, papa, married
To a darling Japanese,
He's bow-legged from his ankles
To his lovely lumpy knees.

His eyes are set at angles
And his nose is on askew,
But I know if "Teddy" will approve
"Twill be all right with you.

O, I'm sure he loves me dearly,
For he told some Nippon men
That he'd never, never sell me
Under fifteen hundred Yen.

All our Occidental customs
I've abandoned, papa dear,
For the Oriental culture
That we used to think so queer.

I can swig a quart of Saki,
Rice and pork eat with a stick,
Hobble out in clogs or sandals
In a style that's really slick.

Though my lovely silk kimona
Leaves my limbs a little bare,
'Tis the garb of dear old Nippon,
So I really do not care.

And I'd sooner, papa darling,
Be a "Geisha" in Japan
Than to wed some scurvy white man
Under your parental ban.

Japs Entertain with Russian Champagne

My Honolulu correspondent writes that during the recent visit of the Japanese squadron to that port champagne flowed in sufficient quantities to float one of the ships. Though the Japanese officers are temperate they have no prejudice against intemperance in others. "But it was learned," says my correspondent, "that the wine so generously dispensed came from the Russian fleet that was captured in the Japan sea and that it is being used to promote friendship in foreign ports. Japanese officers informed acquaintances here that the Russian ships were more abundantly supplied with champagne than with ammunition. They say that the story that the course of the Russian fleet in its long journey was marked by the empty bottles that floated in its wake is almost literally true."

Bancroft on San Francisco

"Some Cities and San Francisco" is the title of a very interesting work that has come from the long idle pen of Mr. Hubert Howe Bancroft. In this work we are afforded a glimpse of the origin of all the principal cities of the world and are given many hints respecting the importance from the standpoint of commercial expediency of rebuilding with an eye to the beautiful. Mr. Bancroft tells us of many cities that were destroyed and rebuilt, and "always," he says, "the city is improved in the rebuilding." Three times London was destroyed by plague and five times by fire, twenty times did Rome suffer, Antwerp, burned in 1871, was quickly rebuilt, Boston, "swept by fires, smallpox, witchcraft, quakerism, snowstorms, earthquakes and proslavery riots, still lives to meditate upon her own superiority and to instruct mankind." Seven times in the last half century Constantinople was swept by fire, damaged by earthquakes and depopulated by pestilence, and in this country several communities have suffered from terrible cataclysms, but only to revive and flourish. Of San Francisco Mr. Bancroft says: "When was improvised an alcalde after the Mexican fashion, and two boards of aldermen were established after the New York fashion, and the high officials saw that they could now and then pick up a twenty-five-dollar fee for deeding a fifty-vara lot, if so be they had on hand some fifty varas, they forthwith went to work to make them by drawing lines in front of the cove and intersecting them at right angles by lines running up over the hills, giving their own names with a sprinkling of bear-flag heroes, not forgetting the usual Washington and Jackson, leaving in the centre a plaza, the cove in front to be filled in later. Winding trails led from the Presidio to the Mission, and from Mission and Presidio to the cove. This was the beginning of San Francisco, which a merciful Providence has five times burned, the last time thoroughly, giving the inhabitants the opportunity to build something better."

Some Interesting History

Mr. Bancroft says that the sites of cities have seldom been chosen because of fitness. Chicagoans assert that a worse place than theirs for a city cannot be found on the shores of Lake Michigan. New York would be in a better position up the Hudson, London in Bristol channel, and San Francisco at Carquinez strait. "Indeed," says Mr. Bancroft, "it was by a Yankee trick that the sand-blown peninsula secured the principal city of the Pacific. It happened in this way. General Vallejo, Mexican commandante residing at Sonoma, upon the arrival of the New American authorities said to them: 'Let it bear the name of my wife Francesca, and let it be the commercial and political metropolis of your Pacific possessions, and I will give you the finest site in the world for a city, with state-house and residences built and ready for your free occupation.' And so it was agreed, and the general made ready for the coming of the legislature. Meanwhile to the American alcalde, who had established his rule at Yerba Buena, a trading hamlet in the cove opposite the island of that name and nucleus of the present, San Francisco, came Folsom, United States army captain and quartermaster, to whom had been given certain lots of land in Yerba Buena, and said: 'Why not call the town San Francisco, and bring hither ships which clear from various ports, for San Francisco bay?' And so it was done; the fine plans of the Mexican general fell to the ground, and the name Benicia was given to what had been Francesca. A year or two later, with five hundred ships of the goldseekers anchored off the cove, not all the men and money in the country could have moved the town from its ill-chosen location." Mr. Baneroft thinks that Fate has in store a very high destiny for San Francisco. He reminds us that when the Mediterranean was the greatest of seas, Carthage and Venice were the greatest of cities, when the Atlantic assumed sway, Ghent, Seville and London, each in turn came to the front, and he suggests that as the Pacific is bound to become the scene of the world's greatest activities, its chief city must become mistress of the world.

Hearst Will Build a Palace

The latest ambition of that indefatigable champion of the plain people, Mr. William Randolph Hearst, is to have a palatial home, one that for grandeur will be unsurpassed by any of the marble mansions of our great plutocrats. He has purchased a site on the famous Riverside Drive at the southeast corner of 105th street, which contains a little more than three city lots. It was purchased in sections. The combined pieces form one of the finest vacant plots of land on Riverside Drive. The dimensions are eighty by one hundred feet. I hear Mr. Hearst has resolved to have the most artistic home in the country, and that he has hopes of organizing an independent social set in New York.

Nipped In the Bud

The Postoffice Department clearly expressed its attitude toward labor unionism among postal employees when last Saturday it took steps that will no doubt result in the death of an incipient organization, the Brotherhood of Railway Mail Clerks, which was going through the birth pangs in San Francisco and Los Angeles. The step taken by the department was direct and effective, consisting of the dismissal from the service of Hugh Shaug, father, mother and midwife of the organization. Shaug is a postal clerk, but of late had been devoting much of his time to the new organization. He hoped to make it national, and to be its president—which would have been a nice, fat job for Shaug. He is something of an agitator, and quite a talented one. While doing his preliminary work in San Francisco he picked out incompetents and soreheads as his lieutenants, and through them soon had the men ripe for unionism. The trouble with Shaug was that he talked too much, and the department knew as much as he did about what he had done and intended to do. Hence the yawning basket, the sharp axe, and the death of the Brotherhood of Railway Mail Clerks. The men have concluded that it will be a lot nicer and a lot less dangerous to form a purely social organization. What a saving it would be if the government could persuade the railroads to charge a fair rate for carrying the mails as easily as it can induce the men to quit organizing. And maybe, in such a case, it could afford to pay the men salaries that would make them feel less inclined to organize. It may be remarked in passing, however, that less tyranny is exercised over the men than is generally supposed. Many think that a postal employee who dares to express any dissatisfaction with his salary is dismissed. The rule is that the men are forbidden to organize with a view to gaining increased salaries or to contribute money for lobbying purposes. There is no objection to their petitioning through the heads of the departments they work in for anything to which they think they are entitled.

A Confidence Game

Shaug had hatched a great lobbying scheme, and back of his efforts in that direction lies a very funny story of the methods of Washington touts and lobbyists. When Shaug went to Washington a few months ago they saw him coming. It was known that he was raising a lobbying fund, part of which had already been contributed, and more of which was to come from the Brotherhood to be. An ex-Californian who does some lobbying of a cheap sort got hold of him, and soon persuaded Shaug that he was the only man in Washington who could engineer his scheme. His work bore all the ear-marks of the ordinary bunkoman, and Shaug swallowed the bait. The lobbyist told him impressively of the secret net-work of pull, influence and cash that underlies Congress, and professed to know every mesh of the net. First, though, he told Shaug, he must be persuaded that his cause was a righteous one before he would give his assistance. Shaug told him of the small pay of the railway clerks, and said that he wanted to get the matter before Congress in order that relief might be obtained. The lobbyist agreed that the cause seemed a just one, but said that he must have time to think it over before joining it, even for money. He said that he and his fellow workers were all honorable men and could not afford to mix up in anything that was not absolutely all right. An appointment was made and Shaug visited him at his office the next morning. There he met the lobbyist's partner—the familiar judge or colonel of the ordinary bunko game. After the proper introduction was gone through the two lobbyists retired to the inner room of their suite in order that they might commune with each other over the problem. After some time they came out and announced that they were willing to be Shaug's agents. While in the sanctuary they had fixed a price, which they announced was eleven thousand five hundred dollars. Of this sum, nine thousand was to go to the lobbyists, and the balance was to be used in wining and dining Congressmen into the proper mood, and in educating the general public through the press. Without a quiver of an eyelash they told Shaug that for a few hundred each they could purchase the influence of some of the leading magazines of the country. Preliminary to this, the lobbyist had told Shaug some good news. He had been to dinner and the theatre the evening before with Postmaster General Cortelyou, and reported that gentleman to be in a most receptive mood, not only willing but eager to raise the wages of every postal employee. Shaug swallowed all this, and the bargain was struck. But, alas, Shaug talked too much. The department heard of Shaug's plans and ambitions, and the complete details of his bargain with the lobbyist—including the story of dinner and the theatre with the sympathetic Cortelyou. So zip! went Shaug's head. It is supposed that Shaug, though he has been dismissed, will continue his agitation. But he will meet with little success in San Francisco. Many of the men went into the Brotherhood unaware of its real aims and methods, and now they are tumbling over each other to back out of it. President Roosevelt is the workingman's best friend, but he feels that it is most prejudicial to the interests of the service to encourage unionism among Government employees.

An Expected Financial Wreck

The Spreckels line has crashed upon the financial atoll so long ago desecrated by shrewd steamship men. From this port to the antipodes the vessels carried handsome profits for the company. The Australian run would have been a big money maker could return cargoes have been secured. But return business was practically nil, the Australians preferring to ship their wool and other freights by way of Suez. For some time past the company has been having trouble over the subsidy allowed by the Australian government for carrying the mails. There is no particular love for Americans bandied about carelessly by the antipodeans. They have their pet ideas regarding this country and one of them is not to foster too ardently anything hailing from America.

Over the Plimsal Line

Recently the Spreckels Company were informed that they must make certain changes in the Sierra and sister vessels if they hoped to continue getting payments for carrying the mails. This notice, coming as it did upon the heels of a poor business season, was a severe blow. And the end was in sight when Uncle Sam refused to yield a subsidy, for demands for payments on outstanding bonds were growing very insistent. I see that the Spreckels's have announced that they will continue steamer service to Honolulu and to Tahiti. They may continue to serve Honolulu, but the chances, under present conditions, are all against a very long continuance of the present Tahiti run. The same weakness prevails there as on the old Australian run—business all one way. Sentiment seems

Certainly there are some very valuable assets still lying around the docks that a hustling captain of industry could easily use as the nucleus of a new and fatly capitalized corporation.

Professor Stephens on Kipling

Kipling's latest book is to be the subject of a lecture by Professor Henry Morse Stephens, Monday evening, March 18, at 8 o'clock under the auspices of the Channing Auxiliary of the First Unitarian Church. The lecture will be given in the church auditorium. This will be the last of the winter course of free Channing Auxiliary lectures. It will doubtless be well attended, for Professor Stephens has a very large following. If it were otherwise it would be a sad commentary on the intelligence of the community, for Professor Stephens is a scholar of the first rank and his lectures are instructive as well as entertaining. The Channing, by the way, is conducting a Lenten course of eight lectures on Russia by Mrs. Ramon E. Wilson. These lectures are given each Friday morning at 10:30 o'clock in the church parlors. With this series the society resumed the work which was one of the features of intellectual life in San Francisco prior to April of last year. Course tickets are sold for $4: to Channing members and high school students, $2; single admission fifty cents. Tickets are on sale on the mornings of the lectures at the First Unitarian Church, at Geary and Franklin streets.

The Thrifty Italian

Truly these are golden days for the men who work with their hands. A man does not need to be a skilled laborer in order to make a living. I was talking a few days ago with a contractor who was superintending the cleaning out of an excavation preparatory to putting up a new building. He had seven Italians, pick and shovel men, working for him. "I pay those fellows two dollars and a half a day," he said, "for nine hours' work. I can remember when half of that for ten or twelve hours' work was considered good. That included board, while these men have to board themselves. But that costs them little. They live mostly on cheap red wine and bread. That's positively all they bring with them to eat at noon. I suppose that at night they add soup and spaghetti. Every one of those men is saving at least two dollars a day. Old Francisco, there, picks up and puts aside all the copper wire he can find, and when he gets quite a bunch of it he sells it. He sold two dollars worth of it yesterday. I tried to point out that it was my time he was using in mining for copper; but he gets in and shovels a little harder after dragging out and winding up each piece, so I suppose it is all right." I ventured the surmise that all this money that was saved went toward a journey back to Italy, there to live in high prosperity. "Don't you believe it," said the contractor. "There's what becomes of a whole lot of it;" and he pointed to new houses and flats on Telegraph Hill. "The first thing these fellows think of is getting hold of a piece of land and putting up a house. As a consequence the Italian quarter built up sooner than any other part of town. Things are better there than before the fire. Some of these laborers are a rough and tough looking lot. But they are industrious and saving. They raise large families, and their children become good, progressive citizens." All of which led me to moralizing on what a benefit it would be to the community if the average American workman had more of the Italian's thrift. No one would want him to go through the privation and lack of comfort to which the newly arrived Italian is willing to submit. But he could save a lot more of his money than he does, and be a whole lot more independent of employer and landlord. The saloons would not thrive so well—but other classes of business would prosper, and the community in general would feel the benefit.

Great Ore Body Uncovered

Late advices from Goldfield announce a strike of large proportions on the Mohawk Consolidated, a lease on the No. 1 claim of the Mohawk. Several tests have been made of the ore and all show that the entire breast uncovered is rock of gilt edged shipping grade. The find was made last Thursday morning when a blast brought the ore to view. It was found at the intersection of a lead which was being followed in the easterly drift with another and much stronger ledge that came in at nearly right angles. Nine feet of this new ledge has been penetrated and no wall is in sight. The assays show an average of better than $400 for the samples, while a tale streak several inches in width returned the handsome sum of $22,000. This formation is doubtless a continuation of the ledge that enriched the owners of the Frances-Mohawk, Hayes Monnette and other leases on the No. 2 claim of the Mohawk. The lease has seven months more to live and within six weeks it will be ready to ship from the new level, while in the meantime there will be a large tonnage extracted from the present workings.

The Passing of the Southern Element

"Have you noticed," asked a friend of mine the other day—"have you noticed, that the influence of the old southern set in society has almost entirely disappeared?" I confessed that I had not thought of the matter. So she prattled on: "Yes, Burlingame has it all its own way now. The death of Mrs. Salisbury sounded the knell of the Southern element in society. The once fashionable clique struggled on with a few feeble receptions and teas until the catastrophe when it received such a body blow that it will probably never raise its head again. Mrs. Salisbury's forceful personality has not been duplicated in her set. The well-liked Mrs. Voorhies is too democratic to be a successful leader. San Francisco has lost forever its traditional Southern atmosphere, and blatant Burlingame with its fevered ambition to emulate Newport now dictates absolutely. Several years ago the most prominent names in the social columns were those of the Salisburys, the Robinsons, the McClungs and the Van Wycks. All these families have experienced vicissitudes but not of a nature that has brought them to the front socially. One of the most feted belles of six years ago was Kathryn Robinson. No function was complete without her. After her second season out she married and like her two cousins, Mrs. Keyes and Mrs. Boardman, has buried herself in domesticity. Many of the Southern set hoped that the mantle of her aunt would fall on young Mrs. Beardsley but they were disappointed. Even Sydney Salisbury who had the position of crown prince in his mother's faction has gone into obscurity. His name no longer greets the eye with the monotonous persistency of yore."

The Real Leader

"What about Mrs. Shorb White?" I asked. "Hasn't she been accepted as a leader?"

"Yes," said my prattling friend, "by the newspapers. She is a most amiable lady, grants interviews on any old topic and all that sort of thing, but she doesn't run things as Mrs. Salisbury did. She derives her authority, Mrs. Salisbury was the source of authority."

"How about Ned Greenway?" I asked.

"Oh, Ned, is merely a leader by right of tradition. He took hold of things when the waters of the bay came up to Montgomery street and society was in a nebulous state. He has never been a leader except in the sense that the impresario of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, who is merely the agent of the stockholders, is a leader. Mrs. White is the same kind of leader. Neither is a leader in the sense that Mrs. Fish or Mrs. Astor is a leader. The real leader in our society is Mrs. Carolan. She is the real, undisputed queen. Mrs. Martin is regarded by the non-elect as the queen, but even she is the vassal of the lady from the purple heights of Chicago. Among those who are coming to the fore socially is Mrs. J. R. K. Nuttall who burst out as an active entertainer at the beginning of the season. After the death of her father some years ago she remained in comparative retirement and every one thought that she had tired of the social game. But when, a short time ago, the social columns began to teem with her doings, society rubbed its eyes, sat up and took notice. Mrs. Nuttall's social position was rendered gilt-edged when she became one of the "innumerable Parrott family." From her father she inherited a large fortune, which, with her mental endowments which are infinitely greater than those of any other woman in her set, should enable her to take precedence over all competitors for leadership.

"May Lady of Turquoises"

"The provincial aristocracy of San Francisco," writes an occasional correspondent from London, "should feel a little chagrined when they hear of the wide swath being cut in this city by Captain Cloman, military attache to the Court of St. James, and his handsome wife who was Mrs. Victor Clement. I met Mrs. Clement in San Francisco a few years ago. She made several fleeting visits to that city and was entertained by some of her friends but they were not of that funny smart set of yours, which, I have recently learned, has become famous for the numerous odd circumstances attending its queer evolution. I doubt whether Burlingame was aware of the existence of the lady who is now Mrs. Cloman. This was probably because she had no press agent, no climber to bid for prestige by pouring drivel into the gush columns. Yet some one in San Francisco dubbed her 'My Lady of Turquoises,' and the name has stuck to her ever since, even in London. The name was given to her because she is the owner of several turquoise mines in Mexico. Her necklaces and ornaments of turquoise are said to be the finest in the world. But in London she is famous for her gold plate which is said to outrival King Edward. The lady who is now Mrs. Cloman was a poor girl when Victor Clement met her. She was many years his junior. It is said that he paid for her education at one of the fashionable boarding schools in San Francisco, and married her immediately after her graduation. Nearly all their married life was spent traveling between South Africa and Mexico. Mrs. Cloman's securities have advanced greatly in value during the last few years, and she is now a very wealthy woman. She is a great success here because she is absolutely unaffected in manner—so different from the majority of modern Americans that try to break in over here.

They Fed the Hungry

"Mrs. Reid, who, for old-time's sake ought to be kind to San Franciscans in London," says my correspondent, "is very negligent. Several powerful society people from the city by the Golden Gate, who expected to be invited to dinner at the embassy were crestfallen when invited only to a big reception or tea. By the way, I hear that the usual reception given to Americans by the Ambassador and Mrs. Reid on Fourth of July will not be the gigantic crush that it was last year as it has been decided to send out special invitations. Heretofore no invitations were issued, but all Americans in London were expected to attend. The polloi of London took advantage of this generosity last year and Mrs. Reid found her drawing-room filled with representatives of the lower middle class. The great unwashed made an attack on the grub and proved themselves great finishers. Mrs. Reid had to issue a hurry call for a fresh supply for the Americans who trooped in a little later. I am surprised that this story never got into print for it went the rounds of the London clubs and was much enjoyed. As the Reids have no charitable inclination to feed the starving poor of London their liveried servant will this year admit only those that have invitations. There will consequently be much disappointment among the Londoners who have heretofore joined heartily in the celebration of the Fourth of July.

My Del Monte correspondent writes: Mr. and Mrs. John B. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. George D. Metcalf, of Berkeley, Miss Marion Huntington and Martin K. Metcalf, U. S. Denicke, of the State University, were at Del Monte over Sunday. * * * Mr. and Mrs. John Galen Howard and Mr. and Mrs. Warren Gregory, of Berkeley, also spent a few days here. * * * Mr. and Mrs. George V. Baxter made another of their frequent visits from the University town. * * * Miss Sarah M. Spooner and Mrs. O. M. Locke went up to town last week to see about having their furniture and personal belongings shipped to Del Monte. They returned a few days ago, and are permanently settled here. All the summer and early winter they were at Del Monte, and then took a two month's tour throughout the South to see if they would prefer to make that their home, but several weeks ago they came back here. * * * Mrs. James Flood and her children were down for the week's end. Miss Jennie Flood and her friend from New York, Miss M. R. Crosby, came a day or so earlier. * * * Mrs. L. ### Fairmont Charity Events

Probably the two busiest women in town are Mrs. M. H. de Young and Miss Jennie Blair, who are among the most active workers for the charity affair which takes place on the 16th of April at the Fairmont Hotel. I heard Mrs. de Young conduct a business meeting the other day and although she has never been classed among the "clubable" women, as an exponent of correct parliamentary procedure she would serve as instructive exemplar to some of the club women who conduct slip shod meetings. The neatness and dispatch with which Mrs. de Young put through an immense volume of business would win praise from a veteran gavel wielder. As the formal opening of the beautiful new hotel is to be a "stag" affair—a Merchants' Association banquet—this charity affair will be the first opportunity for the ladies to get a peep at the Fairmont, and it is expected that an immense crowd will throng the main floor, which will be turned over to the managers of the Nursery for Homeless Children, the Polyclinic and the Doctors' Daughters for that afternoon. Aside from the beauties of the hotel, itself, there will be all sorts of musical attractions to delight the guests. By the way the Nursery for Homeless Children is the pet charity of Mrs. Herbert Law, who never overlooks an opportunity to promote its interests, though her left hand is always modestly inconspicuous.

Mrs. Belleville of London

The Bellevilles who have been guests of the Charley Clarks are now in New York. Mrs. Belleville is a very beautiful woman and like most Englishwomen she is a hygiene enthusiast. Her comments on the desperate chances our women take by not eating marmalade for breakfast, living in houses heated above goose flesh degree, and walking only when necessity demands were highly amusing. Above all she marveled at the fact that none of the Burlingame set play tennis. The racquet was discredited down that way when the golf stick came in and very few society girls know anything about tennis. But now that Mrs. Belleville has assured them that the English aristocracy still develops tennis muscle there is a movement on foot to pull the weeds out of the tennis courts. Mrs. Belleville must have found the tennis enthusiasm in Southern California quite English in brand. The Sutton girls, who head the list of champions, are of English parentage though May Sutton is regarded as an American girl when she goes over there to play. She was defeated last year in England but her friends are confident that she will wrest the honors away from the Britishers this year. She is too good a "sport" to "squeal" but as a matter of fact she was suffering from an unusual and painful illness during her stay in England and that she could play in any "form" whatever is marvelous. May Sutton is on record as saying that the average English girl plays tennis as well as many American champions, so no wonder Mrs. Belleville marveled that we have forgotten its fascinations.

The Scat Question

Wherever the oolong bubbles one hears women discussing the possibility of "scat," the new card game, driving bridge whist out of favor. If these tea table discussions may be taken as an index of our desires and intentions then surely card playing has a fifty vara place in the modern society woman's lot. For the pros and cons of the two games are discussed as seriously and as searchingly as though the introduction of a new card game were an affair of state. Evidently the Japanese question, the Panama canal, and the trusts are of indifferent importance compared to the question whether society shall say "Scat! (but pronounce it "seart") to bridge whist!

The Tragedy of It

An amusing discussion of card affairs claimed a little coterie of enthusiasts who attended Mrs. Eleanor Martin's reception to the Boardmans last week. Mrs. Martin frowns on bridge so the ladies snuggled down in a corner out of her earshot. "I think it a perfect shame," said one, "to introduce scat just when I've learned to play bridge fairly well. Why I've spent $300 in bridge lessons and I simply can't afford to take lessons in scat!" "I did want to have a rest this summer," said another, "but if scat is going to be the thing next winter I suppose we'll have to spend the 'silly season' learning to play it." I pigeonholed those two remarks verbatim in my memory. The rest of the conversation was applied in the same pattern and showed how seriously society takes its "pleasures." The bloodless tragedies of the smart set are never-ending. It is awful to think of women with social position but inadequate means deprived of the services of a discriminating dressmaker, a limousine, and the other luxuries which their wealthier friends enjoy. But it is to weep, when one considers the heartbreaking fate of those who cannot afford to coach for a new card game when fashions change. An appeal to the relief committee might establish a fund for worthy society card players who are unable to meet the demands of modern card playing.

A Mansfeldt Recital

The Mansfeldt Club announce their eighth recital, to take place at Lyric Hall on Wednesday, March 20. Mrs. Ethel Duke-Dean will play a group of Brahms' Compositions never before heard here, and Miss Frances Wilson of Berkeley will be the debutante of the occasion. Miss Wilson is a beautiful girl of pronounced blonde type, who was graduated from Miss Head's school last spring, and is said to possess unusual musical gifts. Miss Joan Baldwin will play the Chopin E minor Concerto with Mrs. Dean at the second piano. It will be remembered that Moriz Rosenthal played this Concerto two weeks ago with the University Symphony Orchestra. Miss Baldwin is rarely talented, and much is expected of her rendition of this wonderful composition, particularly since she has had the advantage of hearing Mr. Rosenthal play it, and much encouragement from him regarding her own performance.

Bogart Arrives

News comes from the East of the great success of Andrew Bogart with the Jefferson De Angelis Opera Company in "The Girl and the Governor" which is due shortly in this city and which is being piloted by Mr. E. D. Price, special representative of the big syndicate. Mr. Bogart has "arrived" with both feet in Broadway, and he has been engaged for the Autumn season in New York by the Shuberts.

The Ernest Peixottos are in New York this winter and their home is the Mecca of Californians of the social and artistic worlds. Their apartments are filled with the paintings and drawings of the artist's and objects d'art picked up in his numerous sojourns abroad.

test over the estate of unfortunate Bertha Dolbeer. Miss Warren recently had Mrs. Tom Eastland and Miss Mary Joliffe, who were counted among Miss Dolbeer's dearest friends, at Del Monte for a week. I have been told that the Xmas presents which she sent to the society people who went on the witness stand were the handsomest things that could be purchased in town. Those who predicted that Miss Warren would court a social career have not had their prognostications verified, for aside from the friends whom she knew as Miss Dolbeer's companion she has made no effort to enlarge her acquaintance in the smart set nor to take the position which her wealth makes possible.

Maternity Benefit

Society has responded with praiseworthy celerity to the call of the San Francisco Maternity for co-operation in the matter of the performance to be given at the Central Theatre on the afternoon of Tuesday, April 2. Most of the boxes have already been sold. Among the purchasers are Mrs. Henry Crocker, Mrs. Mary L. Huntington, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. I. Lowenberg, Mrs. George Pope, Mrs. H. N. Gray, Mrs. George Newhall, Mrs. Charles Stetson Wheeler, Mrs. M. C. Sloss and Mrs. William Irwin. The programme includes a playlet in which Mrs. John D. Sprickels will appear, a vocal solo by Miss Coburn Heath, a play, "The Reformers' League," being the dramatization by Mrs. Ella M. Sexton of a story by Mrs. I. Lowenberg. The San Francisco Maternity is one of the most worthy of San Francisco's charitable institutions. Under its management an excellent system is maintained for the handling of destitute feminine patients, and the society has done a great service to the poor of this city. Mrs. Lowenberg, the President of the society, lost no time in reorganizing her forces after the April fire, and the institution rendered valuable service to the refugees.

Could the skeptics who discredit our amazing progress since the recent unpleasantness see the opera parties of this week they could easily believe themselves in New York. Tait's and the Palace had their usual aggregation of social leaders, and The Severn was crowded with a brilliant throng of our representative first-nighters.

Soldiers of Fortune

An excellent production of "Soldiers of Fortune" is that given this week at Ye Liberty Playhouse in Oakland. The stock company at this house is an organization of superior quality, and the theatregoers of Oakland have come to recognize the fact. Stock productions at Ye Liberty are as a rule infinitely superior in every detail to those that are sent out from New York and that reach Oakland after doing innumerable one-night stands. Mr. George Friend, the stage manager of Ye Liberty, is a man with a genius for giving scenic vraisemblance to the theme in hand, and he never omits an accessory essential to the perfection of an illusion. "Soldiers of Fortune" is a play that calls for a big cast, but the Liberty stock is adequate. Franklyn Underwood as the heroic Clay is the embodiment of the Davis ideal and Frances Slosson gives a most fetching impersonation of the captivating Hope Laugham. But one might run through the whole cast and conscientiously say a complimentary word for every member of the company. Next week commencing Thursday evening the company will appear in "The Strange Adventures of Miss Brown."

More Praise of Florence Roberts

Florence Roberts has been playing the big cities of the Middle West and winning very high encomiums from critics to whom her personality was unknown. And yet Florence Roberts is playing in "The Strength of the Weak," that sentimental drama which Town Talk pronounced worse than mediocre and which New York refused to accept. From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch I learn that the authors of the drama, whose names were not revealed when it was presented in this city, are Charlotte Thompson and Alice M. Smith. The play having been reconstructed since its San Francisco production, many of its technical flaws may have been eradicated. Indeed I am inclined to think it has been improved, for the Post-Dispatch critic says that the theme has been handled with astonishing skill. But while even yet the critics of the Middle West do not agree as to the merits and demerits of the play they are unanimous in their praise of Miss Roberts. One critic says that her rightful place is in the limited ranks of America's best emotional actresses.

Sarah as "Sister Teresa"

Fancy Sarah Bernhardt in the robes of a Carmelite nun! Something of an incongruity, to be sure, but after all an exalting one, for Saint Teresa, the character being impersonated by the great French actress, is a woman of persuasive piety and one need not be told that in breathing life into the character of a drama Sarah Bernhardt never obtrudes her own personality. When she plays Sister Teresa she is Sister Teresa and her pious ardor is wholesomely affecting. "Sister Teresa" is a new play by Catulle Mendes, the foremost of creative writers now in France.

The San Carlo Season

Last Monday the sale of seats for the four Oakland performances of the San Carlo Opera Company opened at Ye Liberty Playhouse and throughout the day there was a great crush in front of the theatre. Though the rain came down in torrents music lovers would not be denied. Grand opera at European opera prices is a great temptation in Oakland. The company will appear Monday night at Ye Liberty in "Giacconda"; Tuesday evening in "La Boheme"; Wednesday matinee in "Faust"; Wednesday evening in "Carmen." The sale of seats for the San Francisco performances is now on at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s on Van Ness above California, and the indications are that the season will be a record breaker. Manager Greenbaum is enthusiastic over the prospects. "Just think," he said the other day, "I arranged within a month after the April disaster for Schumann-Heink, Rosenthal and this big organization and my judgment is being vindicated beyond expectations. Rosenthal told me that when the contract was forwarded him to Vienna he thought it was a bad joke." The opening night at the Chutes Theatre will be Thursday, March 21, and the opera, "La Gioconda" with Nordica in the title role; Friday "La Boheme"; Saturday matinee "Faust"; Saturday evening "Carmen"; and Sunday evening a great double bill, "The Barber of Seville" and "I Pagliacci." The second week will be devoted to "Il Trovatore" Monday, "Rigoletto" Tuesday, "Adrienne Lecouvreur" Wednesday, "Traviata" Thursday. The programme for the balance of the week has not been definitely arranged but "Carmen" will surely have a repetition and a double bill of "Daughter of the Regiment" and "Cavalleria Rusticana" is one of the promises with Tarquini as Santuza.

The Nightingale Next

Despite the fact that "The Wild Rose" still continues to draw large crowds to the American Theatre it will be withdrawn Sunday evening to make way for Offenbach's melodious comic opera, "The Nightingale," which will be presented on Monday evening, March 18. Miss Hemmi, Mr. Carl Haydn, Miss Beatty, Miss Leicester, Mr. Webb, Mr. Kunkel, Mr. Carrier, Mr. Stokes, and Miss Norton will all appear in congenial roles. All the scenes of "The Nightingale" are laid at Lima, Peru, and the plot hinges around a disreputable old viceroy who takes a benevolent interest in the opposite sex and who is so thoroughly disappointed in a pretty young wife because she prefers her husband to himself that he anchors them both very safely to the walls of his private prison, from which predicament they are released by an old prisoner of the Monte Cristo type. This role will be played by Teddy Webb, who played it in New York in a big production with Lillian Russell and Raymond Hitchcock.

The New Alcazar

Belasco and Mayer make definite announcement of the opening of their New Alcazar Theatre on next Monday evening, March 18, when will be presented a delicious comedy of manners of the smart set with a slight interjection of seriousness in the shape of problem to give it ethical tone and balance, "The Altar of Friendship," by Madeleine Lucette Ryley. It was originally produced by N. C. Goodwin and Maxine Elliott and won instant success. This play was selected as the opening bill not only for its dramatic merit, but because all the leading characters are particularly to make it an ideal theatre. Mr. G. B. Benvenuti, an artist of national reputation, has been entrusted with the interior decorations. The entire interior, both as to design and decorative finish, follows closely that used in the Boudoir of Marie de Padilla, who was the wife of the Christian sovereign, who occupied the original Alcazar in Spain. This building is noted the world over for its marvelous Moorish decorations. In keeping with this beautiful playhouse, it will be the aim of Belasco and Mayer to continue their former policy of presenting to their patrons the very best that the market affords in the way of dramatic successes of the most prominent foreign and American authors, and in order to interpret the plays an exceptionally strong company has been brought together without regard to expense. Miss Laura Lang, the leading woman, comes from the East with a splendid reputation for past achievements. She has played leading business with David Warfield and several other prominent stars besides having had considerable experience with some of the best-known stock companies in the country. Mr. Bertram Lytell is a young man of fine personal appearance and is conceded to possess those attributes of magnetism and versatility which go to make a leading man extremely popular. The ingenue roles will be intrusted to Miss Daisy Lovering, who has demonstrated her ability in the line of work for which she is allotted. The other members of the company, consisting of John B. Maher, Ernest Glendinning, Fred J. Butler, H. C. Byers, Walter Belasco, Will R. Walling, Milton Stallard, Albert Easdale, Edgar Franklin, Juliet Crosby, Adele Belgarde, Nera Rosa, Louise Brownell, Marie Merele, Anita Murray, are so well known to the Alcazar patrons and the playgoers of San Francisco that it is hardly necessary to comment upon their individuality. With the increased stage facilities it is promised that the productions at the New Alcazar will surpass those ever before given in any stock organization in this city or in any other city in days gone by. The sale of seats for the opening week is now in progress, and from present indications capacity audiences will be the rule. The opening performance on Monday night will be witnessed by the elite of San Francisco playgoers, and it will undoubtedly be a gala occasion in theatrical annals in this city. For the second week Captain Robert Marshall's delightful play, "The Unforeseen," will receive its first performance in San Francisco. Following this an elaborate production of "The Pit" as dramatized from Frank Norris's popular novel is announced.

is to be found. It is from Buddhism, as assimilated in Japan, that the stoical fortitude has been derived which enables either man or woman to meet almost instinctively any hardships that human life can impose, and to pass from glowing life into the cold grasp of death with a smile. The second main source is found in the native cult Shinto, or the Path of the Gods, the national belief as distinguished from Buddhism, Christianity, and all other religions. Shintoism is nothing more than a form of ancestor worship based on the central belief in the divine origin of the imperial line. But it is from Shintoism that the Japanese have imbibed their faith that the souls of the dead are ever with them, leading an ethereal life in the same world in much the same state as that to which they were accustomed on earth, that death is nothing else than a new life led in this world in a supernatural way. The fortitude of Buddhism, the bright hopefulness of Shintoism, combined to form the character of the Samurai, in its highest idealized aspect, upright, courageous, benevolent, polite, truthful, loyal, and honorable, and it is the idealized spirit of the Samurai, no longer the peculiar attribute of his privileged class, but diffused during the last thirty years throughout the whole nation, that has been the most prominent factor in the history of Japan's modern civilization.

For nearly two hundred and fifty years Japan's only intercourse with the outside world was conducted through the factory of the Dutch East India Company, established on the little island of Desima in the harbor of Nagasaki. The history of Dutch relations with Japan is one in which romance and sordidness are strangely blended. It is told in a new translation of "The History of Japan, 1690-92," by Engelburtus Kaempfer. The original work has long been out of print. According to this history the Portuguese were the European pioneers in Japan. Having discovered the islands by the accident of one of their ships being driven out of her course when on a voyage from Siam to China, they made such good use of their discovery that throughout the latter half of the sixteenth century they held the monopoly of a highly lucrative trade. But the Dutch, their great rivals in the Far East in those days, soon followed on their tracks, and taking advantage of the indiscretion of Jesuit missionaries, succeeded in persuading the Japanese that the object of the Portuguese was, under the guise of Christian propaganda, to bring the country under foreign domination. Christianity and foreign intercourse were then for the first time placed under the ban of the Government. Immense numbers of converts, including many of the very highest ranks of society, had been made by the missionaries. Both missionaries and converts were subjected to a persecution as ruthless as any in the history of the world. All Portuguese and Spaniards were expelled or executed. The remnants of the native Christians, who had taken refuge in the fortified town of Shimabara, made a stout resistance to the Imperial troops, but when the Dutch, with modern artillery, came to the assistance of the Imperialists and battered down the walls, the fortress fell after a siege which had lasted for three months and the defenders to the number of over 37,000 were pitilessly slaughtered. This occurred in 1638 and Japan became hermetically closed to the outside world, a single exception being made in favor of the Dutch, who, as a reward for their services in the extirpation of the native Christians, were permitted to remain and trade in their factory at Desima. But the Japanese made their own estimate of the conduct of the Dutch. While they had been willing to profit by their assistance, they hated and despised the traitors to their own religion who had given it. The trade carried on by the Dutch enriched, beyond the dreams of avarice, both the East India Company and the officials of the factory. Profits were, however, never more dearly earned. The members of the factory were kept as close prisoners on their little island from year's end to year's end, their monotonous existence being varied only by a yearly visit to the capital, during which they were still treated as close prisoners. They were subjected to every degrading personal humiliation that ingenuity could devise. The head of the factory, though in his own country of ambassadorial rank, though professing to be accredited as an ambassador to Japan, was forced to crawl on hands and knees, with forehead touching the ground, into the presence of the Sovereign and both he and his staff were ordered and consented to play the parts of vulgar buffoons for the amusement of the court officials. To all this ignominy the Dutch abjectly submitted. Engelburtus Kaempfer was the medical officer of the factory during the years 1690-92. He was born at Lemgow in Westphalia in 1651. After having served in the diplomatic service of Sweden in Russia and Persia, he joined the Dutch East India Company and proceeded to Japan via Batavia and Siam, arriving at Nagasaki on 24 September 1690. Though he only remained in the country for an aggregate period of twenty-six months, though the circumstances of his residence were such as might well have disheartened one full of optimism, and every possible difficulty of language, jealousy and tyranny was thrown in his way, his laborious and persevering industry enabled him to gather the materials for a work which, it is no exaggeration to say, is monumental as an historical and scientific account of what was then an utterly unknown country. The work, though originally written in German, and subsequently published in Latin, French, Dutch, and German, was curiously enough first given to the world in an English translation in the year 1727. This translation has been long out of print, and obtainable only on rare occasions at a high price. The publication of this new edition is therefore a real public service.

For the story of the material development of Japan one must turn to "Dai Nippon," by Henry Dyer, who went to Japan in 1873 as principal of an engineering college which was founded in that year. According to him the Japanese have laid a solid foundation for national progress in a system of education which is very complete in every department; they have developed their railways, their shipping, their telegraphs, and other appliances of modern life to an astonishing extent; their industry and their commerce have made wonderful development, and the machinery of legislation and administration has been brought into line with those of European countries. Dr. Dyer describes how all these achievements have been brought about and from what they started. He exults without offensive arrogance in his own share in them. He was the founder of engineering science in Japan. His college was one of the most brilliantly successful of all educational institutions, and it is not only in railways and docks and similar direct products of engineering skill, that his pupils have rendered valuable service, but in the army and navy and in manufacturing industry. He deals not only with the past and present, but is bold enough to trespass on the realms of the future, and his views are marked by some elements of novelty. A nation which, as Japan has done, increases her foreign trade within twenty years from less than forty to over six hundred million dollars and her export of fully manufactured goods from practically nothing to close on one hundred million dollars, has already set an example which, although it may not be intensified by an equal ratio of advance in the future, should before long exercise effect even on the conservative Chinese. But though Japan's military efficiency is unquestionable, much has to be done before she can hope to attain the commercial supremacy in the Far East to which she equally aspires. A radical reformation must be effected in the character both of her traders and her workmen and in her industrial organization and management. Her traders are still dishonest and utterly untrustworthy in all transactions, her workmen incapable of continued and assiduous labor, addicted to frequent rests during their working hours, requiring almost equally frequent entire holidays. No reliance can be placed on any uniformity of standard in their work. Her factories are ill managed. Competent supervision of the workmen by capable overseers, discipline, economic division of labor, are elements lacking in nearly all, and the patriarchal spirit, which requires those who occupy responsible and influential positions to provide for all their relatives, produces an excessive number of employees in every department. Cheap labor, if due consideration is given to its quality, no longer exists. The former subservient docility of her workmen is being replaced by a vigorous assertion of the rights of labor. Wages, the cost of living, the standard of comfort, the price of coal have all largely risen within the last few years, and the commercial, if socially illegitimate, advantages Japan has heretofore enjoyed in these respects as compared with Western countries are steadily diminishing. We cannot therefore accept the current extravagant views of Japan's immediate future as a formidable industrial competitor with the West. But she has reached the limit of her agricultural capacity, and her ability to maintain her position as a great military power and to provide the expenditure necessary for it depends on the development of her manufacturing industry.

A somewhat novel experiment was made by F. E. Avery, an automobile dealer in Columbus, Ohio, to try out to his satisfaction the manipulation of the Marsh rim and Diamond Quick Detachable Tires. Requiring him to work with gloves on, Mr. Avery set an inexperienced man to work to change a set of tires. Even thus handicapped, the operator made the entire change in an average of five minutes to the wheel, or twenty minutes for the set.

It is now announced that the Van Ness Theatre will have as one of its great list of attractions the big New York success, "Salomy Jane."

Florence Roberts is to make her appearance at the Novelty Theatre early next month, playing a limited engagement surrounded by the strongest company she has ever had.

The Actor

By A. L. C.

In life's rough path where misery is strewed,
O'er every spot, the cultured and the rude,
Where Fate, it seems, has planted streams of woe,
Over whose struggling depths we're doomed to go;
While kinder nature points a thousand ways,
To ease the destined burthen of our days,
With social joys, with sorrows e'er at strife,
To cheer the gloomy tenement of life—
Surely we owe a debt of pleasure, due
To those whose fancy, wit, or judgment true,
Are formed by Nature Fate's dark frown to mask,
And still employed upon the pleasing task,
To cheer their fellow-travelers on their way,
And swell the little pleasures of the day;
To chase life's gloom, the heavy tear beguile,
And in its place allure the cheerful smile.
Can rigid Fate's diurnal tear deny,
And check the moment's tributary sigh;
Or the hot tears, the furrowed cheeks that burn,
To artless streams of sweet compassion turn;
From living sorrows turn the heartfelt glow;
To genial sighs of sympathetic woe?—
Then how must Gratitude our hearts inspire,
To praise and thanks to those must all admire,
Whose brilliant powers so happily impart,
The chaste allurements of dramatic art!

"By Italian Seas"

Thé leisurely itinery "By Italian Seas" is not confined entirely to Italy, but includes also those neighboring countries which have, at some time, been under Italian rule and are still attached to her more or less, by tradition and similar associations. The text, which is a collaboration by Mr. and Mrs. Ernest C. Peixotto, avoids the description of hackneyed scenes and guide book marvels, says comparatively little about interiors, and less of the biography of kings and popes, and enters into no controversies nor discussions of disputed points. The scenes described are mostly out of doors, and the localities those less familiar than the ones frequented by Cook's Tourists and the "Europe in Twenty Days" class of travelers, and therefore the more grateful to those whose journeyings are taken in the fireside corners. Particularly interesting are the descriptions of the Easter celebration in Sicily and the Marionette theatre, and of those odd corners of the Dalmatian coast where Butterick's paper patterns have not yet superseded the distinctive peasant costume. It is evident that the ladies of the harems of Tunis are still a long way from the state of intellectual development of those of Constantinople, vide Pierre Loti, and it remains to be seen whether they are not the happier for their ignorance. The illustrations of "By Italian Seas" are by the author, and are as unhackneyed in subject as the text. As a supplement to other reading, or independently on its own account this is a book desirable to possess. It is beautifully gotten out and though far from belonging in the catalogue of "gift books," which are too often but Barmecide feasts, it would make a most appreciated gift. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons. Price, $2.50.

the date of his first public appearance he was a great success. Some five or six years ago he visited San Francisco in company with Mark Hambourg, and his playing at that time particularly of Bach created the greatest enthusiasm. While studying in Berlin he met a wonderfully beautiful young American girl who was also studying at the conservatory. It was a case of love at first sight and the American became Mme. Petschnikoff. She too is a violinist of rare talents. At the University Symphony Concert to be given at the Greek Theatre Thursday, April eleven, these two artists will play the double concerto for violin and viola with orchestra by Mozart, Mr. Petschnikoff playing on a rarely beautiful viola, and he will also play the "Tschaikowsky Violin Concerto" with orchestral accompaniment.

"Nanon" to Be Revived

"Nanon," the most popular of light operas in the eighties, is to be revived at Idora Park as soon as "Dorothy" is withdrawn. The old works with their tuneful melodies have caught on with something of the enthusiasm of first productions at the opera house across the bay where Paul Steindorff and Ferris Hartman are establishing a new record.

Comedy Drama at the Colonial

Manager Kurtzig of the Colonial Theatre makes the announcement that "Scrambled Matrimony," a four-act comedy by Howard P. Taylor, will receive its initial presentation in this city at the McAllister street home of stock productions on Monday night, March 18. The story deals with a gay young man who is obliged to palm off his stenographer as his wife and a foundling as his child in order to deceive his rich uncle, to whom he goes to borrow money to tide him over a little financial difficulty. This state of affairs causes many complex situations which are uproariously ridiculous and the fun is fast and furious during the entire four acts.

On the occasion of the first local performance of "Scrambled Matrimony," the Dolphin Boating and Swimming Club will give a large theatre party, in order to entertain the many friends of the members of this organization.

"Piney Ridge," the delightful drama of life in the Tennessee mountains which has been playing to large audiences all week, will be presented for the last time Sunday night.

Hitchcock Is Coming

Raymond Hitchcock, who has scored more positive successes in the realm of comic opera than any other present-day comedian, is announced by Henry W. Savage in a new and novel production, "A Yankee Tourist," which will be seen at the Novelty Theatre for two weeks, commencing next Monday night. The book of "A Yankee Tourist" is by that popular American author, Richard Harding Davis. The lyrics are from the exceedingly facile pen of Wallace Irwin. Alfred G. Robyn, who provided the score of "A Yankee Consul," has written the music of "A Yankee Tourist," and he is said to have exceeded all his best previous efforts in this new score. The cast engaged for the support of Mr. Hitchcock is one of unusual strength, including as it does Flora Zabelle, Helen Hale, Susie Forrester Cawthorne, Eva Fallen, Walter Lawrence, Herbert Cawthorne, Harry Stone, Phillips Smalley, Wallace Beery, E. R. Phillips, M. W. Rale and a typical Savage chorus.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The Orpheum headliners for next week beginning Sunday matinee are the Uessemes, two young Spaniards, who are coming with the reputation of being world beaters as equilibrists. Bert Howard and Leona Bland will present a sketch entitled "A Strange Boy," in which they have made a triumphal tour of the country. Raymond Finlay and Lottie Burke will appear in a dialogue called "In Stageland Satire." The Sharp brothers, exponents of the song and dance art characteristic of the South are also among the new comers, as also is Bert Levy, the artist of the New York Morning Telegraph who will sketch famous people. It will be the last week of May Tully and her company.

The Notable Case of the Marquise des Esbroufettes

You understand, Madame, that I am very particular as to the social status of my tenants."

"Irritated by his question, I observed curtly: 'Never to have heard the name of the Marquise des Esbroufettes is to argue one's self unknown in Parisian society.'"

"Pardon me, Madame," he replied obsequiously, "but I have known many baronesses—and even marquises, whose titles were most authentic, and yet in the words of Desclauzas, these very same ladies, entertained a most promiscuous set of acquaintances." Then he added pompously: "Madame, must not take offense, but must understand that these enquiries are made solely in the interests of my future tenants; the house being empty at the present time, its social status will depend entirely upon its first occupant."

"In spite of my irritation, I was forced to acknowledge that the old man was really right and, convinced that with such an exacting landlord I should have agreeable neighbors, I signed a lease for three years, the rent being quite reasonable, considering the location. Some days later I moved in and at once began spending money with the reckless extravagance of an American millionaire; I had the drawing-room hung in pale blue taffeta, the bedroom in heliotrope velvet, and my boudoir in old rose brocatel."

Here Madame la Marquise paused to sip her tea.

"In short," observed de Courtenay flatteringly, "the exquisite taste of Madame des Esbroufettes transformed the Grujand apartments into an abode fitting for a princess."

"Precisely so," echoed the little Marquise, accepting as a matter of course de Courtenay's commendation.

"Well—who should I meet on the Boulevard the other day," she continued with renewed zest, "but my gay young cousin, Bertrand de Pontades."

"So you have moved," he said. "Yes, to the rue Saint-Georges, near the rue Lafayette."

"The devil! you have. I hope you haven't taken apartments in the house formerly occupied by the Baroness?"

"What Baroness? I asked; whereupon Bertrand smiled enigmatically, bade me good afternoon and promised to call the next day. He fairly gasped as he entered my boudoir: 'Alas, my dear cousin,' he exclaimed, in consternation, 'it is, as I feared—you are living in the house of the Baroness.'"

"Again, I queried—What Baroness? 'A very famous Baroness, a creature of superb physique, her reputation was European, her splendid equipage was a sort of advertisement, and known all over Paris, she followed what is now called in England, Mrs. Warren's Profession.'"

"Heavens! I exclaimed, what deception on the part of old Grujand, who fairly bombarded me with questions as to my respectability."

"And for most potent reasons, my dear Cousin; he wished to renew his house, both materially and spiritually, and you were to be used as a decoy bird. When prospective tenants would enquire from the concierge if the house were occupied by people of standing this personage could answer proudly: Well, I should say so, the first suite is occupied by Madame la Marquise des Esbroufettes."

"You are right, Bertrand, I said, quivering with indignation, and I have served well Monsieur Grujand's purpose, for the entire house is tenanted. Bertrand insisted that I should vacate at once. I then understood why Gustave, the valet de chambre, had complained of the almost perpetual ringing of the door bell. Strangers, foreigners, of almost every nationality who had probably not heard of the demise of the Chatelaine, had enquired at the door for the famous Baroness; only last week a Chinaman insisted upon being let in, maintaining that he had been decorated with the coral button, and was a Mandarin of high distinction. He demanded an immediate interview with the Baroness. Gustave was obliged to forcibly eject him, and he went off, swearing that he would lodge a complaint against us at the Chinese Embassy."

"Upon my word, Marquise, you give us the picture of a veritable international entente cordiale," laughingly observed de Foy.

"And to think," wailed Madame de Vigier, "that Lord Dalrymple, of the English legation, saw me coming out of that house."

"But what have you done in the matter?" chorused the trio.

"I at once demanded the cancellation of my lease. Grujand positively refused to grant it, alleging, that it was not his place to inform me of the occupancy of the Baroness—that I should have known it. You understand he values me, as a placard of respectability, a full blown in the bottle advertisement, for his house, and resolutely refuses to permit me to move my furnishings, unless I pay him in full for the three years' lease. This proposition I declined, and sent immediately for my lawyer, Monsieur Brontassard to whom I related the facts, including Gustave's battle royal with the Chinese Mandarin, and Grujand's deception. My lawyer declared that I had a most excellent case, and has already drawn up a writ for presentation in court against the landlord, in which he demands the cancellation of my lease, reimbursement of the money expended in the decoration of the apartments, and a good round sum for the damage done my reputation in dwelling in such a notorious domicile." The case will be notable, declared the little Marquise, as she bade her friends good-bye.

"Always sensational" said de Courtenay, as the golden pompadour, with its alluring plume, disappeared from the grill room.

"But what would society do, without sensations?" languidly queried Madame de Vigier.

How Old Was Maria?

Mary Wilkins Freeman might have called her new novel "How Old Was Maria?" instead of "By the Light of the Soul," for the question presents itself in every crisis. In the very first sentence we are told that Maria Edgham was a "very young girl." She is introduced to us sitting in the village prayer meeting and speculating to herself as to how she will manage to lure one of her boy schoolmates into walking home with her, which would seem to place her as somewhere about sixteen. She is old enough to go to church alone in the evening, clever enough to slip on her best frock and hat, and make her way down the back stairs and through the side door, in order to escape her mother's eye, yet her father stops at the vestry for her, on the understanding that she is too young to return without attendance, and after she is indoors it transpires that the glories of the new frock have been somewhat eclipsed by the fact that Maria could not button it properly without motherly assistance, so it would appear that she could not be more than ten or twelve. Again, after she had gone upstairs to her room, the prinkings and preening which she indulged herself in, arranging her hair this and that way, smiling and bowing at herself in her mirror, would put her well past eighteen, and yet, after her mother's sudden death on the same night, when her aunt came to oversee the household, that thrifty New England spinster thought her niece young enough to defy the conventions and economize her mourning frocks by wearing out her colored ones at home. Harold M. Bret, who is responsible for the illustrations, evidently thought her all of sixteen or seventeen at this time, yet "she was in the high school, even at her age, and she stood high in her classes," something unprecedented in the experience of teachers generally, who know only too well that there is no room for boys and books in the same head. A year after the death of Maria's mother her father married again, choosing for his second wife Maria's teacher. This Miss Slome began to take notice of her prospective stepdaughter then, addressing her as "you sweet little thing," a form of address resented by a self-respecting five-year-old. The little boy whom Maria had set her heart upon, Wollaston Lee, had given his childish affections to this same teacher, and had resolved to marry her if she would wait, a form of courtship common enough in little lads of eight or under, but when boys have advanced as far as the high schools they have usually outgrown that stage of affection. However, little Lee upbraids Maria for her father's treachery, throws himself down in the grass and wails his disappointment aloud, whereupon Maria takes him by the hand and the two children return to the schoolhouse to offer negotiations, Maria proclaiming the virtues of Wollaston, as far surpassing those of her father, as a husband, again, a bit of childishness worthy of a five-year-old. Maria wore her first kid gloves at her father's wedding, if that offers any gauge. Her school does not appear to have been particularly select, nor her choice of companions especially circumspect, yet, though at every mention it is borne in upon us that the other children were coarse, precocious, or otherwise sophisticated, Maria is always the lily growing out of the dunghill. The next move of any importance in Maria's life is a visit to her aunt in New Hampshire, where we find her again "so young," yet old enough to make kitten love to the boy next door, and to promise to correspond with him. On her return to her own home, where, meanwhile a little sister has arrived, Maria is represented as something quite miraculously out of the ordinary, since she fell in love with the baby, as if any little girl would not, especially one to whom any sort of a baby was a novelty, much less a beautiful, well dressed and good-tempered one. later she is still young enough to indulge in a hair-pulling match on the street with the nursemaid over the right to wheel the infant in its perambulator, and to feed the little creature on molasses candy concocted in a tenement house. The crisis of Maria's life came when the little sister was big enough to run away from the house and find her way to the railroad station, where a mistake of one of the train hands, who supposed the child was accompanying some of the women passengers, placed the little girl on a train for New York. It was on the same morning that Maria began to attend a school in a neighboring town some fifteen miles from Edgway, and we are told minutely all about her new costume. By this time she had finished her high school course and was approximately a college freshman. Her new skirt, we are told, touched the ground, and her stepmother designed having it shortened because she had no intention of having her own age gauged by that of the girl's. When Maria returned that evening with her schoolmates, amongst them the same boy who was the object of her early affections, she was met at the station by the news of the baby's loss, and started off on a wild goose chase to New York, accompanied by the Lee boy and a girl who had been her classmate in the high school, one of the poor-white class whose associations and traditions were not particularly elevated. Naturally little Evelyn was not waiting for her sister at the New York depot, and when the trio started to return it was so late that they supposed the last train had left, so that they were at a loss how to proceed. Gladys Mann had a vague idea that for Maria to be "talked about" would be an irreparable misfortune, and an equally vague notion that somehow the scandal could be averted if she and the Lee boy were to marry. They did not know where they were, but, finding herself in front of some church from which a congregation was being dismissed, this poor-white girl seized upon the minister and demanded that he proceed to marry her companions. He asked for no license or authority, but proceeded to assume that the lad had induced Maria to leave home with him, and lectured the boy roundly on his behavior. It was Gladys Mann who answered all the inquiries. Lee was nineteen, but again, "How old was Maria?" "Going on—" "What?" She was evidently quite as old as the others, every bit as precocious as Gladys Mann, and really the one responsible for the escapade. After all, there was a train back to Edgway that night on which the three returned. Maria swore the others to secrecy. Lee offered to lay the case before Mr. Edgway, or to give up his schooling and go to work in order to assume his responsibilities, but she would consent to neither. Her liking for Lee turned to disgust, and she settled down to enjoy her martyrdom. After finishing her college course Maria engaged in teaching, and in spite of the fact that she continued in that arduous occupation, warranted to age any woman three years to one, until her little sister had grown up and graduated from a normal school, Maria still excited compassion as a "young girl," and is described as looking younger by years than she really was. Now, how old WAS she? On the whole it is a story that abounds in temperamental inconsistencies, and that is lacking in plausibility. Published by Harper & Brother.

By Way of Criticism

Monday morning! and not a word from the great American centre of finance on the subject uppermost in the minds of men. Distracted curiosity asks questions and receives no answer but an echo. And thus is the boasted alertness and enterprise of American journalism vindicated! Last week we were worked into a state of feverish anxiety over the manoeuvring of the great Captains of Finance in a drama of throbbing emotional interest abounding in thrilling episode and involving the fate of one of the greatest figures in the industrial world. Sunday came with an element of uncertainty, the element that always fills curiosity, the element that makes for suspense, and it left us hanging intent on what was passing behind the scenes. We had reason to expect another installment of news the following morning, news that would confirm or deny, news that would in greater or less degree assuage our curiosity. But not one word were we vouchsafed. So at this writing we are as much in the dark as though every reporter in New York, every correspondent in Washington, had either turned Sabbatarian or quit work out of respect for the memory of St. Patrick. It is now uncertain whether Mr. Harriman outwitted his enemies, or whether they ousted him from his proud position of dictator of the railroad world. It will not be sufficient for the correspondents to plead that the stock market was closed on Sunday. There are innumerable news channels that might have been exploited; and if they were exploited for the New York newspapers the directors of the Associated Press should make some revolutionary changes in the New York bureau. The fact that the biggest news story of the day was abruptly cut off at a time when the whole country was deeply interested in all the aspects of the situation is an indictment of the intelligence behind the American press.

When Harriman Gave Offense

Behind the conspiracy to crush Mr. E. H. Harriman, we were told, was the stalwart figure of the furibund Roosevelt. This is one of the incredible details. And yet it received vraisemblance from the circumstance that some months ago it was currently reported in New York and asserted by the newspapers of that city that Mr. Harriman had incurred the wrath of our supreme ruler and that the concentrated power of the Government was to be devoted to his proper chastening, or, as the Sun expressed it somewhat profanely, "his trimming." It was represented that at the gubernatorial election in New York, Mr. Harriman supported Mr. Hearst, not by prayer and supplication within his Broadway cloister, but along the highways and byways and with insufferable ostentation. When besought to behave himself like a good Republican and contribute some cash to the support of the ticket Mr. Harriman imprecated the Republican party, especially the Republican party as typified in the person of one Theodore Roosevelt. All of which was communicated to Mr. Roosevelt who then and there resolved to unleash the cohorts of the law. It was predicted that an example would be made of Mr. Harriman; that his disjecta membra would soon strew the continent.

The President's Motives

The forces unleashed by Mr. Roosevelt were those of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Nobody will find fault with him for putting them on the trail of Mr. Harriman. But it is not complimentary to our President to suggest that in a spirit of revenge he resolved to hound Mr. Harriman into obscurity; or to accuse him of having entered into a conspiracy with J. Pierpont Morgan and other Wall street gamblers for the purpose of crippling Mr. Harriman financially. We prefer to believe that Mr. Harriman was investigated in his capacity as railroad president, being in a sense the incarnation of all the evil practices of railroad corporations, and that the President's only purpose was to obtain data for guidance in the perfection of a system for the abatement of those practices. It would be most painful to learn that even in the furtherance of what he conceived to be a good cause, he established so vicious a precedent as that of making the United States Treasury the backbone of a conspiracy to crush a private citizen. However repugnant the Harriman personality may be to Mr. Roosevelt, it is nevertheless nothing more than the embodiment of the sentiments, aims and aspirations of the predatory plutocrats of Wall street. The evils over which Mr. Roosevelt hopes to triumph are not to be eradicated by the crushing of Mr. Harriman. There is only one way to eradicate them, and that is by making them dangerous and unprofitable. Why should Mr. Roosevelt conspire with the bankers of Wall street to destroy Mr. Harriman? Why insist that they withdraw their backing? Mr. Harriman has done nothing more than promote their interests in the manner most suitable to their tastes. Why should Roosevelt conspire with a Pierpont Morgan of Steel Trust infamy? Mr. Morgan is nothing more than a stock-jobber, as ruthless in the indulgence of his rapacity and greed as any of the buccaneers of frenzied finance that have contributed to the ugliness of the history of American trusts.

Frenzied Financiering

We have been told that Mr. Harriman's story of the Chicago and Alton Railroad deal, told before the Interstate Commerce Commission, astounded the country, and in its extraordinary revelations caused grave alarm and even consternation throughout the civilized world. Mr. Harriman told us that in conjunction with three associates, Messrs. Mortimer Schiff, George J. Gould and James Stillman, in 1899, he obtained possession of 97 per cent of the stock of the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company. This railroad was then capitalized at about $39,000,000, and had a bonded debt of only eight and a half or nine millions. Each member of the syndicate acquired 54,535 shares of the stock. These men, constituting the syndicate and controlling the railroad, immediately placed a mortgage of forty millions upon the property and sold thirty-two millions of these bonds in the main to themselves, at sixty-five cents on the dollar or $650 a bond. Later some of these bonds were sold in the open market at over 90—ten millions being taken by the New York Life Insurance Company at 96, and one million in August, 1900, by the Equitable at 92, the members of the syndicate thus making about $300 on each bond. Almost immediately after the acquisition of the property by the syndicate, a dividend of 30 per cent on the capital stock was declared, and on May 7, 1900, this dividend, amounting to $6,669,180, was paid. Mr. Harriman further admitted that from the time he and his associates bought the railroad until last October, when he got out, the railroad's capital or debt to bondholders and stockholders had been increased to $122,872,327; that of this only $32,500,000 had been invested in the property itself, and there was therefore some sixty millions of water in the new capitalization. All of which, of course, was frenzied financiering. It wasn't, we are told, a nice thing for those gentlemen to declare that thirty per cent dividend since it had not been earned, but the only difference between that transaction and many others that have taken place in the industrial world is that it was somewhat more stupendous. The underlying principle long ago received the endorsement of the most successful financiers. It is one of the things which, perhaps, Mr. Root has advised his plutocratic clients, may be done without involving one's self in trouble. It has been sanctified by the best "usage." Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan has executed plans of equally daring conception. So if Roosevelt doesn't like Mr. Harriman on account of his ways he should be reluctant to enter into a conspiracy with Mr. Morgan. There is something to be said of Mr. Harriman that cannot be said of Mr. Morgan: he is a great constructive genius and he has greatly improved the railroad properties under his control. Moreover he is not really all Hyde. He has his Jekyll side like the rest of us. Much of the obloquy that has been visited upon him is wholly undeserved. In contrast with Morgan there is much to admire in Harriman. When Morgan was in the financial saddle he was so pervasive and noisy that he slopped over everything. He caught the eye with the glitter of his pomp and circumstance. His coaches, yachts and palaces were constantly forcing themselves on the attention. When he wasn't threatening to empty the art palaces of Europe he was busy running a church in this country. He typified one of the most repulsive characteristics of our modern materialistic civilization. We do not hope to see him regain his power.

Brisbane's Latest

Just as we were beginning to felicitate ourselves on the abatement of enthusiasm among the didactic philosophers of the cult of Municipal Ownership the incorrable Brisbane was seized with a fresh inspiration and startled us with another broadside of fuliginous sophistries. Mr. Brisbane is not the most courteous of controversialists. He seeks to forestall rebuttal of his assertions by cutting the ground from under the feet of those that would debate with him—to poison by anticipation the public mind and to infuse into the imagination of readers suspicion and mistrust. So he starts out with the demagogic assumption that the newspapers in which municipal ownership is decried have been paid to lie by "corporations that rob the American people." We will not assume that Mr. Brisbane has been paid to lie in furtherance of a newspaper policy based on the theory that it is profitable to cater to the prejudices of the mob; but in examining his latest assertions in support of municipal ownership we could not but take notice of the conspicuous misrepresentation employed to bolster up a most disingenuous argument. Mr. Brisbane assumes by way of preface that it is "unnecessary to tell intelligent men that it is better for the people to own their street railways and their gas companies than to have private individuals own them and rob the people." Nevertheless he submits certain facts for intelligent men to ponder. The facts were imported from the city of Copenhagen where the street railways are not owned but controlled by the municipality which, however, does own the electric power plant from which it supplies the railway with power at a profit of $187,000 a year. Under this system the conditions are very fine for the employees. One of the fine features is that which compels the company to pension for life men that have been in its employ twenty-five years. But Mr. Brisbane includes among his facts—inadvertently we presume—this one: "The charter ends in forty years and then the entire property goes to the city free of charge and free of incumbrance." Does Mr. Brisbane wish us to believe that the corporation is to be compelled to pay pensions after it goes out of existence? Or does he expect us to apprehend that under this very fine system the city of Copenhagen is bound to assume in the end the pension burdens of the company? We infer that these burdens are to be assumed by the city and that Mr. Brisbane, the enthusiastic socialist, who looks forward to the time when none of us shall be compelled to work, thinks that the prospect is most delightful.

Their Fondest Theory

Mr. Brisbane's latest oracular utterance on the subject of municipal ownership invites the retorsio argument. For his argument proves, if it proves anything, that municipal ownership is unnecessary for the achievement of the ends which he conceives to be essential to perfect happiness. He points out that the railways of Copenhagen are yielding ideal results, but the railways of Copenhagen are not owned by the municipality; they are merely under its control as are the railways of this city, the only difference being that the legislative body of Copenhagen exacts from the companies more than is exacted from the railways of San Francisco. In other words it has been demonstrated in Copenhagen that it is not necessary for the municipality to own the street railways; that satisfactory results can be obtained by legislative enactment. Mr. Brisbane does not assert that the people of Copenhagen deem government ownership essential to the purification of government. But the fondest theory upon which Mr. Brisbane and the other communistic advocates of municipal ownership base their notion of its excellence is that it will deprive corporations of their evil power and superinduce the purification of government. It would certainly deprive corporations of their evil power, but to assume that it would purify the government is absurd. The widespread governmental corruption for which corporate power is responsible is not the disease from which we are suffering; it is only one of the symptoms. It is a familiar axiom that it is impossible to make government more virtuous than the people from whom the government derives its authority. The enormous frauds and robberies that appall us are only rendered possible by a low condition of the public morality. The unparalleled malfeasance of which there is so much complaint is only an outcropping of a universally underlying baseness. We abominate the crooks of Wall Street and their tools in Washington not because they are rogues, not because they shock the public conscience, not because they are the enemies of public virtue, not because their vicious example is demoralizing and fraught with dangerous consequences to the life of the nation, but because we are their victims and because they are getting more than their share of this world's goods and are depriving us of what we conceive to be our just proportion. Instead of making the purification of the government a purely selfish aim we should first endeavor to cultivate a sense of morality to which corruption would be repugnant. In the possession of such a sense we should have no reason for suggesting experimental expedients for the abatement of malfeasance in office. And until we shall have cultivated such a sense there will be small chance of compassing the ends contemplated by the cocksure advocates of municipal ownership.

The Tyranny of Socialism

Not all the advocates of municipal ownership are interested in the problem of the purification of government. It is the step toward communism that excites the enthusiasm of a large percentage of them, obsessed as they are by the notion that it is possible and desirable to achieve equality of condition among men. Lycurgus was the only man that ever succeeded in bringing about that condition, but to perfect it he had to utilize slaves who, of course, were not reckoned with as ordinary mortals. Communism would be all right if voluntary, but involuntary communism is the best that we can ever hope to have and that involves compulsion and loss of individuality. Under the government ownership phase of communism we are able to glimpse some of the evils which are inseparable from the conditions that the socialists would plunge us into. The inevitable effect of municipal ownership is tyranny of government, and tyranny of government is not more tolerable in a republic than in an oligarchy. Under any form of government it has corruption for a concomitant. We saw the effect of it on Russia during the war with Japan, and we see the effect of it in France today. In London where, as a consequence of the growth of political power in the fructiferous soil of municipal ownership, the officials were beginning to tyrannize over the people, three weeks ago the people revolted and swept the socialists out of office. In France where the Government takes a hand in almost every form of industry the political machine of the Ministry is so powerful that the statesmen have been able, in defiance of the religious sentiment of the country, to despoil the church of which a vast majority of the people are zealous communicants. We have wondered at the acquiescence of the people of France in the crimes against their church. The explanation is that the people consult their material interests first and their religious sentiments afterwards, and that the government machine through a system of espionage and reprisal makes it clear to the people that it is to their material advantage to concur in the pet measures of the Ministry. Small communities in France have often experienced the inconveniences that result from a government boycott. Nothing short of another revolution will emancipate the people of France and the seeds of it are rapidly being sown.

Perspective Impressions

A motion to reorganize our smart set will soon be in order.

That begira from Burlingame predicted in Town Talk some months ago is about to begin.

Perhaps Mr. Samuel Gompers would like to amend his eulogy of Mr. Eugene Schmitz.

It is now evident that the morals of this community lacked the essential basis—a fear of punishment.

French critics are shocked at American morals as glimpsed during the progress of the Thaw case. It isn't fair to take that case as a basis of criticism. We would prefer to have foreign critics judge our morals by the standards that we set up when we throw up our hands in holy horror at sight or sound of a work of art. But unfortunately they prefer to judge our intelligence instead of our morals by such standards.

The union labor organizations of the East that have been proclaiming their confidence in Mayor Schmitz and lamenting the efforts of San Francisco Capital to destroy Organized Labor are the same that accuse the officials of Idaho of conspiring to railroad to the penitentiary that innocent trio, Moyer, Hayward and Pettibone.

We hate to yield to temptation. Constrained by an irresistible impulse we point with pride to the fact that Town Talk was the first paper to give hint to the truth about Schmitz and Ruef. The hint was given in the first week of the Schmitz administration.

The Globe-Democrat of St. Louis is trying to popularize religion by publishing lists of those present at church service. We doubt that this scheme will prove successful. In these enlightened days of Higher Criticism to go to church is to be suspected of superstitious fears.

The Fashion Makers of Paris

By Robert L. Taylor

Seldom do I read the fashion notes in the press, but the other day I happened upon the announcement in the Examiner that "Kimono Sleeves will be Welcomed" and I read that Madame McGraff of the City of Paris was speeding homewards from the French capital with models of the latest "creations." This reminded me of the fact that French fashions are entirely in the hands of German, Austrian and Swiss Jews whose nationalities we have never associated with womanly elegance. During a recent tour of research in the region of la haute couture in Paris I learned that it is only in the second-rate houses that the deft Frenchwoman survives. Foreigners are now exploiting the prestige won by the Frenchwoman in the days agone. The intruders represent sweeping changes in the economic world. The grand couturieres have behind them great staffs, great administrations and great capital. Bechhof David pays for his ware-rooms in the Place Vendome a rent of 2,000,000 fr. a year. He is a Basle Switzer. Dreßcoll, also of the Place Vendome, is under a rent of 80,000 fr. He is from Vienna. Beer is from Frankfort, the once brilliant city of Imperial Coronations. He is in the Place de l'Opera, and pays a rent of 100,000 fr. a year. Doeuillet who learned his business in the house of the Sisters Callot, and who is a remarkably handsome man, is another Place Vendome couturier who pays at least 60,000 fr. a year for his flat. He receives the countenance and patronage of a very powerful group of French women and has togged out many a new-rich aristocrat from California. Nearly every couturier, by the way, has a pull in society, and each is backed by some woman known as a leader of her set. The Comtesse de Pourtales, for example, was a tout for Douchet who still has a high reputation, which the style of the Comtesse Pourtales justifies. I have seen some of his very taking creations on the backs of Chicagoan ladies who visited Paris to see European life and spend money. One of them took me to a clothes parade. It saddened me; the girls who paraded in the lovely things seemed to me so jaded and oppressed. Evil for evil, I really thought Turkey less bad than Europe. It seems I judged too hastily, for the Turks everywhere outside of palaces turn their wives and odalisques to industrial account by making them work sewing machines for embroidery and other kinds of stitching.

It is a mistake to suppose that wealthy French ladies grudge to give high prices for dresses that please them. But they must please. Where French ladies economize is in never buying anything they do not want, however trifling the price asked for it. When a French lady has to order a new dress she bends her whole clear calculating mind to the task of thinking out what she should spend, what becomes her, and what suits her station. She never dreams of asking her couturier or couturiere what is the fashion, but tells what she wants and wishes to know what can be offered. The wares presented are carefully examined. They are often discarded, after a superficial examination, when there are suspicions of a wish to palm off rossignols. Once a choice has been made, no capricious backing out from it is to be feared. The subject of dress is dismissed from the mind. The highest praise that can be given at the final trying on is: "Cela va." Foreign ladies are all the time allowing themselves to be bewildered into buying what the shopman wants to sell, and perhaps could not sell to French ladies. Those occasions merveilleuses spread out on tables and flauntingly displayed in shop windows are to catch the foreign lady who puts away "bargains" in presses in the hope of being able to use them hereafter to advantage. Our grandmothers and their great-grandmothers did this in days when travelling was ruinously dear. Their habits have become over-ruling instinct in many countries where thought is less sharply clear and feminine character less decided than in France.

To be told that a Grand Duchess, or even a Queen or Empress, had ordered such or such a toilette would not in the slightest degree affect the choice of a French lady. But the information could not fail to interest vastly the outlander, and to impel her to give the same order or a similar one. This is why the behests of Royal and Imperial ladies are so carefully attended to in the great dressmaking houses. However busy a director and his forewoman, he or she will find time to attend to what is known as une cliente de grand marque, or customer with a resonant title, in itself an advertisement and potent to "suggestionize" the new-rich from over the seas. The newcomers are quite regardless of expense when they want—with safety from ridicule, and even with distinction, as they imagine—to present a fine appearance at pleasure resorts.

French ladies of the highest standing prefer an excellent couturiere at the head of a house that is counted first-rate in the second-rate class. They can have there less hurried consultations than in the grander establishment where all must, under high pressure, move automatically. Those first among the second-rate houses can now associate with others abroad to copyright for a season particularly rich and elegant Lyons and other tissues, and thus avoid furnishing things likely to be common before the end of the season. Copyrighting stuffs was one of the devices of Worth for providing sumptuousities with the exclusive stamp or cachet of his house.

The couturiere is more docile than the couturier, and has, when a Parisienne from birth or long residence, wonderful invention and a marvellously fine feeling for flimsy elegance and light garnitures. I used to see this so often in the ware rooms in the Rue Sainte Anne of a couturiere utterly unknown to fame, though she made all the modern dresses for the French ladies for some years, and always for Mlle. Fix, the amie of the Poet Musset, and, jointly with M. Jaluzot whom

A Memento From The Ruins

By Lewis F. Laughlin

From the ashes of Chinatown was recovered some weeks ago a small iron chest containing a few trinkets and several old and faded photographs. It was the property of Ah Chong, an actor, who was a great favorite among the theatre-goers of the Chinese quarter, and who tells me that the Chinese drama will soon be revived. Among the photographs in Chong's chest was one which will some day have considerable historic value. It is the counterfeit presentment of the stage of the old Jackson Street theatre where flourished the dramatic art of Chinatown for nearly three decades. What a precious memento of the Chinatown of the past! Of all the familiar landmarks and interiors of that quaint and fragrant spot there is none which holds interests for so vast a throng as the stage of the old Jackson street theatre. No guide that ever piloted a throng of sight-seers through the innumerable odors of Chinatown ever excluded from his itinerary that noisome sanctuary of the pagan art. On that stage were enacted scenes that were never dreamt of in the philosophy of the classic dramatists of China. Seldom was it the lot of a Chinese audience to be entirely pre-occupied with the mimic pagentry, intrigue and tragedy depicted by the hired stars. For fully as great as the distinguished heroes impersonated upon the stage were many of the flesh-and-blood personages that came out to indulge their own curiosity. As diverting to the heathens, perhaps, as the passions simulated by the histrionic gents, were the emotions exhibited by the intruders from all quarters of the globe and from all walks of life who came to marvel at the exotic wonders to be witnessed in the heart of an American city. It was on the stage of the Jackson Street Theatre that Sarah Bernhardt obtained her first accurate conception of the primitive principles of the histrionic art. It was the orchestra on that stage that first interested Sousa in the primitive principles of harmony and enthralled Paderewski with its mystic complexities of tone. George Anthony Froude, when he visited this city in 1886 spent night after night on that stage studying the Chinese drama and trying to interpret the symbols by which the actors kept the audience in touch with the progress of the play. It was one of Robert Louis Stevenson's favorite places of amusement. General Grant was so fascinated by what he beheld that it was hard to entice him away.

Ah Chong In Stage Costume

Going to the Jackson Street Theatre was tantamount to transporting one's self back hundreds of years to the time when the theatre was in its infancy. While that theatre was flourishing we needed no assistance from Ben Greet to acquaint us with primitive conditions when stage setting was mostly dependent on the imagination. On the stage were a few tables and chairs and an occasional bit of painted cloth. With these everything essential was represented. The imagination of the visitor was continually taxed to know what idea a certain chair or table symbolized. For it is taken for granted in the convention of the Chinese drama that the audience will supply any deficiency in respect to scenery. It reminds us of the time when Quince was ordered by the immortal Bottom to represent a wall, which he did with the fingers of his hand. When a Chinese mimic robber wishes to break into a house, he does so by pressing against an imaginary door or by mounting a chair. He mounts a horse by throwing one leg into the air. He builds an imaginary bridge by putting two chairs together, or attacks a fortification, maybe, by climbing on a table or making a movement as if to climb a table. To the Chinese mind these pantomimic movements are easily cognizable. But the actor, to be proficient in his art, must be adept in conveying a sense of the development of the

The Grafters In the Nude

In our enthusiasm over the collapse of the municipal graft machine let us not incline to Pharisaism. The iniquity of some poor degraded wretches has been exposed and the indications are that some proud names are to be eternally smirched; social prestige is reeling and spinning, one knows not witherward, on the flood of things, but why permit ourselves to be diverted by the humor of this grim tragedy or affect to be terribly shocked at the infernalities of the faithless officials and corrupt citizens? This is not a time for self-righteous demonstration. Besides that is something we should find difficult to justify. The weeds of crime that have grown rank in our midst were indigenous to the soil. This community has been no better than the men that have been elected to office. But now that we have seen that vice is its own retribution we shall probably mend our manners. We have received a salutary lesson and shall perhaps reform. Meanwhile we should not rejoice in the suffering and misery of the contemptible wretches whose greed led to their disgrace. There is sufficient cause for elation in the tremendous impetus given to virtue by the exemplification of the imbecility of bribe-giving. It would be impossible to measure the extent of the city's moral uplift. We have all been made to see the danger of getting anything by bribery. The inconveniences incident to this crime are incalculable. The wear and tear of wondering whether the fellow that has been seduced will keep it to himself is an unremittent source of worry. How accurate now may be the conception of any man equipped with an imagination of the worm of conscience that begnaws the soul, that pestiferous worm that will not sleep and never dies. The great incitement to guilt is the hope of sinning with impunity, but a man cannot delude himself with that hope when he gives a bribe. In this world of doubtful compensations there's nothing to alleviate the terrors that are inseparable from the jailable status. When a bribe is given there's somebody that receives it and the knowledge of that circumstance necessarily fills the environment of the bribe-giver with visionary terrors and shapeless forms of fear. If any one of our distinguished society gents, who now realizes that it is a vulgar thing to give a bribe, would be as candid as a supervisor he would confess that haughty guilt has the disagreeable habit of exulting with impious joy.

A Plea In Extenuation

The saddest thing about all this graft exposure is that it makes such a whited sepulchre out of our Smart Set. By the time that Heney and Burns get through with the prosecution the current Blue Book will be a joke. It is really a great tragedy when you come to think it over—the awful prospect of disgrace that confronts so many of our first families that have been drinking Ned Greenway's wine on fat dividends from quasi-public corporations. I am not one of those that nurse an embittered animosity toward our conscienceless aristocrats, for as I hinted in the preceding paragraph I am inclined to hold responsible for the iniquities of the Schmitz administration the people by whom that audacious fiddler was thrice elected to office. Neither they nor those that scoffed at and abused

Rudolph Spreckels and imprecated the Grand Jury and howled about conspiracy and persecution can persuade me of the sincerity of their asserted faith in the impenetrability of the transparent looters of the city. So I feel that there is something to be urged in extenuation of the conscienceless rich who found that privileges were not to be obtained from the servants of the people except for money. Perhaps I will be reminded of the advice of Lord Bacon: "Do not bind thine own hands or thy servants' hands, but bind the hands of suitors from offering," but Bacon was a bribe-taker and he had to say something to save his own conscience.

Lonerger Was Conscience Stricken

The case of the Home Telephone Company is one that might be pleaded in justification of my suggestion. According to the testimony thus far solicited this company was intent upon introducing competition in the telephone business and met with opposition from the corporation already intrenched. The old company had bribed the supervisors to keep out competition. In order to bestow a boon on the people the Home Company was obliged to seduce the servants of the people. It was of course a crime to offset the weight of the old company's bribe even for the beneficent purpose of breaking up a monopoly, but there is nothing to inhibit us from viewing the transaction with a lenient eye. And yet there is another aspect of the case. It is this: the Home Company persuaded the supervisors not only to accept a bribe but also to quell their scruples against robbing the Pacific States Company. Supervisor Lonergan suffered some awful stings of conscience in consequence of this peculiarly vicious transaction. In telling about it while being subjected to the sweating process, he said: "It thrubled me so much that I couldn't shleep at night, and so I gave th' old company back half their money."

Martin's Joke

With the confessions of the bribe-takers before us it is easy to appreciate the Walter Martin witticism contained in a letter to an Eastern friend, to which I made reference some weeks ago. Said Martin: "I am thinking of buying a home in San Rafael so that I shall be close to my friends when they move over to Marin county." But when Walter Martin conceived that witticism he did not think that his half-brother, J. Downey Harvey, would be involved in the scandal. The dailies have been discussing the probability of Harvey's indictment, but I have been told that he is in no danger; that he never paid a cent for any of the privileges granted to the Ocean Shore railroad. He preferred to cultivate the friendship of Schmitz along social lines. It was Harvey that inserted the social bee in the Schmitz hat-band. He enthralled the Mayor with visions of pink teas and other functions. This was a cheap way of doing business for as everybody knows the Harvey family has social prestige to burn. If Schmitz has any of the Ocean Shore stock, it was given him as a mark of Mr. Harvey's esteem. However all Schmitz's official conduct will be laid bare and no guilty man will escape. Rudolph Spreckels is inexorable. He announced at the beginning that if one of his own family should be caught no mercy should be extended. He is after the very biggest game in society and I am told that after the Lonergan confession he reminded a man of social prominence of his resolution to let no guilty man escape.

"You remember what I told you," said Spreckels.

"Yes," said the corporation magnate.

"Well," said Spreckels, "I've caught you."

And the poor wretch dissolved in tears.

Gerstle and Bourn

The reported uneasiness of Mark Gerstle over the exposure of the Home Telephone Company's connection with the graft scandal is little short of surprising. Mr. Gerstle is one of the distinguished citizens who have been pooh-poohing the graft prosecution. On the day of the excitement outside of the Temple, when the fight was being made to invalidate Abe Ruef's appointment of himself to the district attorneyship, Mr. Gerstle appeared in the throng and laughingly remarked:

"This is opera bouffe up to date."

"Perhaps he will think it's a tragedy before it's all over," said a newspaper man who was informed of the remark. It was about the same time that Billy Bourn of the Gas Company announced that Mayor Schmitz was one of the best fellows he had ever met. Mr. Bourn started for Europe a few weeks ago.

Ruef In Tears

It is said that Abe Ruef burst into tears a few days ago when he saw himself depicted in a morning paper as a rat caught and stayed in a mad scamper through the tangled tape of legal technicalities by the hand of the law. Without doubt it was a cruel cartoon, needlessly cruel one might venture to say without being suspected of any sympathetic leaning toward the indicted boss, and it is not remarkable that when Ruef saw it, with the load of several unexpected defeats bearing heavily upon his spirits, he should lose self control and exhibit his feelings by crying. But the source of those tears was not a momentary hurt to a sensitive nature caused by a brutal cartoon. Ruef is not wont to bare his deeper feelings to the world; he habitually affects the debonnaire gayety of a leader who is confident that temporary setbacks will eventually be followed by complete and overwhelming victory and vindication. Of late, it is true, this affectation has been harder and harder to maintain and the effort to preserve it from the suspicions of his followers has wrought heavily on his powers of self-control. His bursting into tears marked the point beyond which human endurance could not go and when the boss had paid that tribute to weakness he set resolutely about the task of restoring the outward signs of that confidence in himself and his cause which he must pretend to feel or else give up the battle at once. Nevertheless Ruef is depressed, terribly depressed; doubts and misgivings are gnawing at his vitals, a ghostly rout of the shadows of future events are haunting his brain. Anyone skilled in reading the soul through the eyes and wresting a carefully-hidden secret from the unconscious looks and gestures of its possessor will come to that conclusion after seeing Ruef either in the courtroom or out of it.

His Tactical Blunders

The consistent turning-down of all his efforts at escape by judges against whom he cannot make those accusations of bias and prejudice which he has so freely hurled at the trial judge frightened him into a stern realization of his position which he was able to evade as long as the preliminary obstructions devised by his attorneys put off his trial and bolstered the wavering courage of his followers with visions of interminable delays and a final victory on legal technicalities. Ruef sees now that he has committed tactical blunders from the effects of which he can never escape. The same egotistic recklessness which led him to remove the district attorney and appoint himself to the position dictated the idiotic course of running away after obtaining that famous writ of error about which has gathered more scandal than the California bench had ever known before. The consciousness of his mistakes is being borne in upon him more and more every day and the effect upon his mind is so great that he cannot conceal it. This may be read not only in his tears but also in the statements which he gave out for publication. The change in the tone of his interviews was most remarkable and it mirrors faithfully the gradual metamorphosis which has transformed him from a jaunty and self-satisfied director of political destinies to an anxious suitor for any means of escape from his predicaments. From laughing in the face of his prosecution and answering charges of graft with personal denunciation of his accusers Ruef recently came to the immediate consideration of his perilous position.

His Followers Deserting Him

Abe Ruef probably read his fate as much in the transformed attitude of his followers as in the continued defeats of his attorneys. He saw himself being deserted by those who erstwhile shouted from the housetops in defense of his innocence, the tax-eaters, the job-chasers, the small fry politicians and that large proportion of hoi polloi which regarded him as another article in the political creed which embraces Mayor Schmitz with all his works and pomps. A change, subtle in its progress but unmistakable in its completed form, came over all these soldiers and camp-followers in the great army of municipal graft of which Ruef was the commander-in-chief long before the supervisors confessed. Like the perfidious pretorians they cast him down and waited for events to point the fingers of destiny at his successor in power. This change was the marvel of the town and none of the discerning failed to mark it. Men who formerly foamed at the mouth when the grand jury was mentioned and could only speak of it in terms which at their mildest deprecated its existence as a blot on American institutions, began to express the most perfect sympathy with its strivings and the most unqualified reverence for its high moral purposes. Men who denounced the assistant district attorney as a hessian, a persecutor and in other language not fit for type became willing to admit that the lawyer who overthrew the arrayed powers which battled to keep the United States senator for Oregon out of jail was probably capable of "landing" a boss whose influence does not extend beyond this peninsula.

Financiers and Soreheads

The Fireman's Fund Insurance Company "displayed a commendable spirit," says one of the dailies, for confessing judgment in a suit for $24,250, the amount of certain policies covering buildings destroyed in the big conflagration of last year. As the company withheld payment on the ground that the buildings were demolished by dynamite and as it was shown that the buildings were destroyed by fire, I am at a loss to know what alternative was at the discretion of the company. To me the most amiable treatment which the Fireman's Fund Company has received at the hands of the press is little short of remarkable. There have been many animadversions on the conduct of this company but not in the newspapers, and now I am told, its tangled and deplorable affairs having been satisfactorily adjusted, its officers are highly elated at the success of their business sagacity, and are cutting as wide a swath as ever in insurance circles. Not only are they self-satisfied; it is reported that they are exuberant. This is not the humor of the policyholders who contributed to the prosperity of these shrewd financiers in the halcyon ante-conflagration days. But these policyholders are an irritable lot. Some of them are positively unreasonable. They have not the slightest appreciation of financial ability. The spectacle of the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company in process of convalescence, getting a fresh hold on the insurance business of this city holds no charms for them. They are frank and candid soreheads and unashamed.

Rebuked In Vain

The other day the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company issued a circular breathing confidence in the situation and aglow with enthusiasm at the prospect. It was a fine piece of commercial literature, but there were Philistines among the disgruntled policyholders from whom it evoked nothing more than the tribute of a sneer. It is a most reprehensible temperament that takes no pride in the success of local institutions. Something to that effect was what I took occasion to observe for the purpose of rebuking one of the malcontents, but I might as well have tried to blow a hole in a stone wall. He proved incorrigible and asked me if I remembered the fire in the vault. Of course I remembered it. I also remembered that it was of no significance. He laughed. "I imagine," said he, "that it served at least to justify the report that the list of stockholders was burned up."

"Nonsense," said I.

"Well," said he, "there was no list accessible after the fire, but by some species of legerdemain one was obtained when it became necessary to put on an assessment for the purpose of raising enough money to make the sixty-cent settlement."

He Was Full of Data

This same unregenerate individual asked me why he should take any pride in the local company that in advance of all other companies raised the question of exemption under all policies covering buildings that were destroyed by dynamite. I promptly denied that the Fireman's Fund was the first to assume that discreditable position, whereupon he pulled out a roll of bills and wanted to bet that he could prove by President Dutton's statement published within two weeks after the fire, that it was the local company that gave the foreign companies a tip as to how they might coerce policyholders into a satisfactory compromise. It is always unprofitable to engage in dialectics with a man of gambling proclivities who imagines that a betting proposition is an irrefragable syllogism. But this fellow abounded in data which he conceived to be prejudicial to the reputation of the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company for moral responsibility and he scattered it with the blinding profusion of a mitrail-leuse. He was even supplied with excerpts from law books by which he was prepared to prove that the unauthorized shifting of the assets of the old company to the new company was something with which the District Attorney might reasonably have concerned himself. As I was breaking away he demanded to know whether I did not think it would be a good thing to compel corporations to file lists of their stockholders once a month in the office of the Secretary of State. All of which I mention merely to indicate that despite the fact that the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company has made an admirable adjustment of its affairs and is once more gallantly sailing the financial seas o'er, it has not escaped cruel criticism.

A Poet In Prose

Joaquin Miller, Poet of the Sierras and Bard of the Oakland Foothills, has put the lyre out of commission and dropped into prose, in which form of the literary art he is hardly less skilled than in the favorite of his Muse. But the literary world need not be startled. Poet Miller has not abandoned his plectrum forever. Howsoever gifted a poet may be for the singing of heroes when it comes to commemorating his own ego, it is no easy matter to strike the canter and jog-trot of metre. And it is of himself that Poet Miller is writing in sober and earnest prose. Like that other veteran of the pen Mark Twain he has taken in his old age to the pastime of unfolding the story of his past in serial form. But unlike Mark he does not call it his autobiography. He prefers to entitle it "Joaquin Miller's Reminiscences." The first instalment is noteworthy in that it discloses the fact that no state can claim Joaquin Miller as its favorite son. He was born in a covered wagon crossing "the line dividing Indiana from Ohio." "My cradle," Poet Miller tells us, "was a covered wagon, pointed west," an eminently proper direction for it to point with such a burden; for it was an empire of song that was having its course marked out. But what I wish to remark is: How fortunate that Joaquin Miller was on the dividing line at the time of his birth! If he had come into the world within the borders of Indiana what an awfully commonplace gang of contemporaries he would have!

When His Thoughts Soar

Even in prose it is hard for Miller not to be a poet. Try as he will to avoid the empyrean of song his thoughts aglow with feeling will soar and his feeling illuminated by thought will revel in beautiful images. "At last," he writes, "there was a breath of spring in the tossing tops of the maple trees and gray, black and fox squirrels began to leap from branch to branch overhead and chatter and quirk their tossy tails, the crows cawed and cawed from the tallest tree tops, the blue jay jawed us from the spice and hazel bush as we passed, and school was dismissed, for it was sugar-making time." What better poetry do you want than that? In those lines is comprehended the quintessence of poesy. Who, but a poet, supersensitive soul, could hear the chatter of tossy tails or so deftly in prose rhyme the cawing of the crow and the jawing of the jay? All through this narrative prose poem I catch the clang-tint of words that bespeak the true ode-smith. Poet Miller tells us how fast his father split rails that were fragrant and how deftly he put up a fence, "a beautiful, fragrant, red and yellow fence." A thing may be beautiful, as we know, even though only of utilitarian value, but it takes a true poet to see beauty in a rail fence and it takes a true poet to smell it. And as we know Joaquin Miller is a true poet even in prose, and especially, if we can believe Ambrose Bierce, in his hair. It was many years ago that Bierce wrote these immortal lines—immortal, not on account of the lines, but on account of the theme:

Writer folk across the bay
Take the pains to see and say—
All their upward palms in air:
"Joaquin Miller's cut his hair!"
Hasten, hasten, writer folk—
In the gutters rake and poke,
If by God's exceeding grace
You may hit upon the place
Where the barber threw at length
Sampson's literary strength.
Find it, find it if you can:
Happy the successful man!
He has but to put one strand
In his beaver's inner band
And his intellect will soar
As it never did before!
While an inch of it remains
He will not be for brains,
And at last ('twill so befall)
Fit to cease to write at all.

If they knew 'Admiral' Beckley as well as this community knows him they would probably have overlooked the presumption and enjoyed a hearty laugh. But while they had no previous knowledge of 'Admiral' Beckley they were evidently not misled, for they gave him no salute on the occasion of his official 'reception' of Admiral Tomioka at Hilo. 'Admiral' Beckley has been for many years the purser of the Island steamer Kinau. He is one of the very few native Hawaiians that have the acquisitive faculty. He inherits that probably from his grandfather Beckley, who came here about a century ago and entered the service of Kamehameha the Great. 'Admiral' Beckley has accumulated a pretty good pile of this world's goods and also considerable self-esteem. For many years Beckley was 'Commodore' Beckley in recognition of the fact that he was the oldest employe of the Wilder fleet of inter-island vessels. But at the time Commodore Dewey won the Battle of Manila Bay and was made an Admiral, some wag suggested that 'Commodore' Beckley's achievements entitled him to a like promotion in rank. The 'Commodore' took it seriously, immediately adopted the title of Admiral, and bought an Admiral's uniform. He has been Admiral Beckley ever since. The only time the title ever disturbed him was when Rear-Admiral Merry commanded the naval station here. Some wag sent Beckley a letter signed 'U. R. Merry' demanding to know if he was aware that the unlawful assumption of a naval title was a penal offense. He was worried for awhile and consulted the newspapers as to his rights in the premises. They assured him that the title was his by right of preemption, whereupon he published a truculent open letter asserting his inalienable right and it has never been questioned since."

The Official Visit

"Admiral Beckley's official visit to the Japanese fleet was inspired by a wag who suggested to the Secretary of the Territory that as there were no Territorial officials in Hilo, it would be appropriate to request 'Admiral' Beckley, the man of highest naval title in the Territory, to welcome the fleet on its arrival. Jack loves a joke. A wireless message was sent to the 'Admiral.' It reached him on the arrival of the Kinau in Hilo a few hours ahead of the squadron. So having made up his accounts of tickets and deck passage fares, collected and checked out his freight, the 'Admiral' donned his brilliant uniform, pinned across his breast the several medals he has received in voting contests and his Hawaiian decorations, hid all this glory under a linen duster, put a silk hat on his head, and took a boat out to the squadron in advance of the Committee of Reception from the Hilo Board of Trade, and the Japanese Merchants' Association. Arriving at Admiral Tokio's flagship his boat drew up at the lowered staging, and he threw back his linen duster disclosing his uniform and medals. Of course, at sight of all this splendor he was ushered aboard, and to the presence of Admiral Tomioka. The story of what ensued has been told by the 'Admiral,' according to whom the Japanese commander and his squadron were welcomed in fine Kanaka English to Hilo, the ancient seat of Beckley's naked and tattooed ancestor Mooheau. Admiral Tomioka inquired if he was an Admiral of the American navy. He made this reply: 'Oh, no; I am the Admiral of Harbor No. 54, Masters' and Pilots' Association of America.' The reception, he described, as most cordial. But it was brilliant. Admiral Tomioka did a great deal of scraping and bowing and ushered his visitor to the deck and to his 'barge,' just at the time of the arrival of the Civic Committee of Americans and Japanese who came only in civilian dress, some of them indeed in sack coats and straw hats. 'Admiral' Beckley cannot quite understand why no salute was fired in his honor, but supposes it was due to Admiral Tomioka's confusion at the unexpectedness of being greeted by one of his rank. However, he treasures no hard feeling toward the Jap. After his visit to Tomioka he reported to Secretary Atkinson and had the great seal of the Territory affixed to the wireless telegram on which he had received his commission."

An Earthquake Story

The March number of the Strand Magazine of London contains a story of our local Chinatown written by Herman Scheffauer, the well-known San Francisco poet, who has been in Europe for two years past. The story is illustrated by G. Leslie Hunter, a young Scotch artist who spent several recent years here, and who is now in Paris. The author has not violated tradition in writing this story. It deals, in the approved way of Chinatown fiction, with the buying of an unwilling bride and her rescue by a missionary lady. But between the purchase and the rescue, which take place in April, comes a thrilling episode. The earth turns upside down, houses rock and crumble, and flames light the dawn. Some of our residents may remember the incident. Scheffauer must have taken his idea of what happened in San Francisco on that fateful morning from some of the accounts published in the East and abroad. We who lived here at the time, and in whose memories the details are rather fresh, cannot recall anything quite so terrible as Scheffauer describes. He may be excused on the plea of distance and poetic license. However, the story is a very good one, far better than the usual run of such tales, the generality of which depict a Chinatown that no one who knows it would recognize.

A Tale of a Ghost

This is a story of a gray cat and of the uneasy gray ghost of that cat. The tale of the ghost shall be first and the tale of the cat come last—as is fit and natural. This ghost wanders at night around the ruins of what was once a great hotel of this city, and acts so strangely as to attract the attention of the other shades which haunt the bricks and debris that have succeeded magnificence. It makes its first appearance each night where the office of the hotel once was, and wanders disconsolately there as though waiting for the touch of a friendly hand. It goes to the site of the kitchen next, and drifts from there to the spot where the barroom stood. Then the silence that has marked its wandering is broken. Perching on a pile of bricks that mark the location of the lunch counter, it wails lugubriously. The noise at which one throws boots and coal at midnight is music compared to the hideous solo of this gray ghost. Midnight travelers toward the ferry forget their anxiety over catching the last boat and shudder as the eerie notes float across the ruins. The other ghosts flee in terror, and this wraith of a cat that was reigns supreme on the pile of bricks and debris that marks the site of the lunch counter. And why is this? It is because when the cat of which this is the ghost died, it was put to improper use, made to appear what it was not. This cat was the pride of the hotel, and wandered with stately tread around the office. It became part of the establishment. But one day a trunk fell on it and crushed out all its nine lives at one smash. A scullion carried out the remains, and as he went through the kitchen a demoniacal idea came into the head of the chef. He ordered the cat skinned, and when that had been done he cooked it. He made a ragout of that cat, and putting it on a silver platter he heaped fancy molds of jelly around it and sent it to the barroom, where it was put on the free lunch counter. And men "did eat thereof" and pronounced it excellent—particularly an eminent actor, who sent out to the kitchen and wanted to know what the dish was. When he was told, the cat came back, and the memory of it has haunted him through the years. If he could but see the gray ghost of a cat that sits on the heap of brick and debris and wails at midnight the reality of the apparition might persuade him that his lunch was less tangible than it seemed at the time. And by the way, this is not told just because it is a story, but because it is a fact. The gray ghost that caterwauls, and which you may hear at midnight if you have the courage to go and listen, is proof of all that I have told.

The New Model G

CADILLAC

Persistent demand for a thoroughly high-grade, medium-powered, four-cylinder automobile, at a price somewhat lower than the large touring cars, has led to the production of our new Cadillac Model G.

At every stage of designing and finishing Model G has received all the care and thought that could possibly be given a car costing twice as much.

The motor is finished in its vital parts to gauges that insure mechanical accuracy to the thousandth of an inch. It is equipped with our automatic ring type governor; a new type of muffler is used, giving a silent exhaust, at the same time almost entirely eliminating back pressure.

Direct shaft drive; transmission of a selective type sliding gear. Direct drive on high speed with no gears in mesh. Wheel base, 100 inches; stylish body design.

Union War In Nevada

"Goldfield and the other mining camps," writes a correspondent, "are just now suffering from one of the greatest mining wars that has ever afflicted Nevada. The mines are shut down, the business houses are closed, armed members of the Citizens' Safety Committee patrol the streets and what outbreak may occur before the end is reached no man knows. Unless a compromise is effected soon the same scenes of violence are expected that characterized the Colorado miners' war that ended in the murder of Governor Steunenberg. The contest is between two wings of union labor: the Industrial Workers of the World and the American Federation of Labor. Business men of the camp side with the latter organization and they hope to drive the I. W. W. out of the Nevada labor field or at least to cripple its now very extensive powers. For a long time past the I. W. W. has been a trying thorn in the side of Goldfield labor employers. The local branch was started by agitators from the most restless of the Colorado mining camps. The present trouble is the result of the efforts of the I. W. W. to dragoon the miners and carpenters' unions into their ranks. Numerous members of the latter unions stoutly opposed any such affiliation. The American Federation of Labor came to their rescue and offered them sanctuary. Both sides summoned organizers and since then there has been a steady flow of statements, charges and ultimatums between the two factions. Sheriff Ingalls has sworn in a hundred miners as deputy sheriffs. To counteract this undue labor influence the Citizens' Safety Committee have had fifty selected business men also sworn in as deputies. Every man in town carries a gun and is ready to use it in defending the side he espouses. Hot heads there are a-plentiful and how soon one of them will start a fusillade by some overt act no man knows. 'Diamondfield' Jack Davis wired to Governor Sparks to call out the militia and declare martial law but Nevada has no militia and Sparks told Sheriff Ingalls to stay fast with his job.

Effect on Stocks

"Meanwhile the stock market has had the life literally slumped out of it. Values have been squeezed from twenty-five to sixty per cent, and if any investor has any hope or life left it is because he has a bunch of money that will withstand the almighty crash of calamity. Oddly enough the lusty promotion touts of the holiday season foretold this month of March as the auspicious time when prices would hit the high mark of speculation. Dreams to beggar the trusting! Now the alluring bait to cozen the investor is the advice that 'prices will go up, sure, when this labor trouble is settled.' There are those who are not slow to say that the present trouble was started by a coterie of unconscionable promoters to smash stocks and that it has now got beyond their control.

A Human Interest Story

Some months ago I was visiting in one of the mining counties of this state. I was with the manager of a gold mine. We were more than fifty miles from the railroad. Meadows stretched before us rich in grass, with the watering stream fringed with trees, and the encircling mountains rising with rocky fronts and summits into a clear sky. Immediately before us was a log cabin, occupied one night in every two weeks by the driver of a mule train and his boy of ten years. The driver, familiarly known as Ned, had been in this

His boy attracted my attention. The lad's dark complexion gave the suggestion of a Mexican mother, for Tim had the florid color of the Celt. Later the boy's hat fell off, and revealed the

"That little mulatto is the record left of one of the saddest chapters in life that I ever heard of."

"His father seems to be wrapped up in him," I remarked; "I presume his mother was a negress."

"No," said he.

"What's the story?"

"Twenty years ago Ned married a girl of a very decent white family in this county. Ten or eleven years ago he was following the same business that he is now in. His wife and daughter lived at one end of his route in a near valley. A negro pack driver was on the same route. When the boy was born the mother died. Ned has done some killing in his time, but he didn't kill the negro. The man is still living. And Ned keeps the boy."

Morgan's Great Fluke

It was an interesting and somewhat thrilling story that was told in the dispatches last week of the conspiracy to oust Mr. Edward H. Harriman from control of the railroad properties that have come under his sway. The plans for the undoing of Harriman were designed by his most virulent enemy, Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, who has been fighting the railroad magnate in the columns of the Sun, the Morgan paper, for several years. Morgan's financial power waned about the time that Harriman obtained the backing of Standard Oil and began asserting himself as a factor in the financial world, and it was owing to the clash of Morgan and Harriman interests that the big insurance scandal was precipitated. In that scandal Morgan fared far worse than Harriman and he has been ever since on the qui vive for an opportunity for revenge. Frequently has the Sun betrayed the resentment of Morgan in satirical thrusts at Harriman and by watching that paper one could easily keep in touch with the ebb and flow of the troubled financial waters. Last week we were told that Morgan had consummated his long-cherished revenge. So great was his confidence in the efficacy of his plans that he put himself beyond reach of everybody, feeling that on his return Harriman would be down and out. But from later developments it appeared that his absence was disastrous to none but himself. Harriman has something of the Fisk quality of genius. Jim Fisk never failed to turn the tables on his adversaries. Once upon a time when Commodore Vanderbilt undertook to drive Fisk into bankruptcy by cutting rates, Fisk ceased all railroad operations and began shipping cattle from the Middle West over the Vanderbilt lines. He made immense profits out of the cattle industry and Vanderbilt was seriously crippled before he discovered that he was enriching his enemy. Harriman's enemies nearly always fare as did Fisk's, and on more than one occasion Harriman has followed to the letter tactics that were invented by Fisk.

Harriman's Fad

Edward H. Harriman is essentially a money-making machine—the greatest perhaps that the world has ever seen in operation. For many years he was something of a mystery. Reared among the great financial kings of Wall street he became imbued with their ideas respecting the unimportance of that public which a Vanderbilt had scornfully consigned to the lower regions. He had the plutocratic conception of the sanctity of wealth and thought there was nothing but impotent and impudent sansculottism beyond the gilded portals of the temple of finance. Keeping an impassible barrier between himself and the public it was an isolated position that he occupied until a few months ago when he showed signs of becoming cognizant of the responsibilities of wealth. Up to that time it was almost impossible to obtain a photograph of the great railroad magnate, but suddenly he changed his attitude and abated his prejudice against the white light of publicity. He became accessible to magazine reporters and they began exploiting his personality for the benefit of the curious. Now we hear that Mr. Harri-man is very much like other men and that he has some very fine traits of character. He is a man of a very sympathetic nature and all his life he has been devoted to the hobby of promoting the welfare of boys. He is President of the largest club of boys in the world. It is the Boys' Club of New York City which occupies a big building containing gymnasia, baths, play-rooms and reading-rooms. A great deal of Mr. Harri-man's leisure is spent at that club and he is as zealous for its interests as for any of his great industrial enterprises.

Where Is the Flag?

Inquiry has been set on foot respecting the whereabouts of the particular Star Spangled Banner which the anxious eyes of Francis Scott Key saw "by the dawn's early light" floating in triumph over Fort McHenry. It is said that James Lick, to whom we are indebted for the statue of Key in Golden Gate Park, acquired possession of the flag and that it was on exhibition in the museum of the California Academy of Sciences when that building was destroyed by fire. But Lick died in 1876; and according to one authority, as late as 1880 the flag was carried in procession in Baltimore by two hundred descendants of the defenders of Fort McHenry. The inquiry concerning the flag arose some days ago when it was learned that Admiral George Dewey and others had organized a Francis Scott Key Memorial Association to acquire and preserve the house in Georgetown where the composer of "The Star Spangled Banner" lived at the time he applied to President Madison to aid in effecting the release of his friend, Dr. William Beanes, who had been captured by the British and was held a prisoner on one of the ships investing Baltimore. It was while watching Admiral Cochrane's bombardment of Fort McHenry that Key was inspired to right the soul-stirring lines that have been adopted by the American people as their national anthem.

Coming Flight of Orators

I am quite curious to see the list of speakers for the Merchants' Association banquet which will formally open the Fairmont hotel, April 18th. The occasion will commemorate the events of the greatest conflagration in history and will accordingly offer these to rouse the spirit of the most phlegmatic speaker. The Merchants' Association will entertain some very prominent guests around the banquet board, notables who will be in the West about that time and will make it quite convenient to drop into San Francisco for the gathering. The old order passeth, and of late years a number of orators, more than locally famous in the

THE WEEK BEFORE EASTER

- ☞ Just one week, and the Lenten season will be past.
- ☞ Everything is ready at this store—at your store.
- ☞ It is timely now, with but few days to spare, to suggest that the new suit, the confirmation dress, the hat, and everything else with which you intend to signalize the new season should be given some attention.
- ☞ The beautiful displays of wash goods, millinery, robes, ribbons, silks, waists and fancy garments are now at their best—most complete and in greatest varieties.
- ☞ If your requirements include garments that need to be altered to insure perfection of fit, then it is advisable to give this attention tomorrow if possible to avoid the crowding and enforced hurry made necessary by the rush of work that is put upon dressmakers and milliners as the season becomes more advanced.

eighties and nineties, have shifted from the scene. Undoubtedly the occasion and the subjects will call forth new aspirants for oratorical honors, young men destined to cut important figures in the upbuilding of the new and greater San Francisco. From all viewpoints the banquet is sure to be by far the most interesting event of its kind ever held here.

Just a Few Witticisms

Two buds and their escort the other evening attempted to enter a delayed Sutter street car, and upon being squeezed in like sardines one of the buds found herself stray hanging at such an angle that she was forced to gaze steadfastly at the roof of the lurching car, which was decorated with the usual advertising signs. Presently an illuminating smile overspread her countenance and pointing to the particular sign which had caused it, she signaled her companions to read it. They too gazed skyward and read: "For space in this car apply to Varney and Green." "I think I will," said the first bud: "I need it." The second bud blithely suggested. "Don't you think we'd better make it a round robin?" Thereupon the escort: "Wouldn't bother. The United Railroads are doing the round robbin' and they object to competition."

He Has a Record

There was more than politics in Governor Gillett's appointment of W. E. Dennison as a member of the Board of Harbor Commissioners. Dennison, who is a contractor, has a record in harbor work, and Gillett knows of it, for it was made in his home county.

Dennison is the man who built the jetties that have transformed Humboldt Bar from one of the most dangerous harbors on the coast into a comparatively safe one. Gillett has had his brother, formerly a freight clerk in Eureka, made a Deputy United States Marshal for this district. Young Gillett is a cautious lad, and would not let the newspaper reporters have his photograph, evidently scenting a bunco game. "I'm new down here," he said, "and I'm going to be careful what I do until I get onto the ropes."

Elsie Syle's Engagement

Berkeley society is very much interested in the approaching marriage of Elsie Syle to a Mr. Madison of Santa Barbara. The distressing circumstances under which her father, Professor Syle, died have not yet been effaced from the college mind and there are still people who hold the head of the University responsible for the "brain storm" which darkened Professor Syle's last days. His death left his family in straitened circumstances and Elsie Syle, who had been most carefully educated by her father, had to take up the financial burdens. She jumped right into the breach and startled everyone by pluckily accepting a position to bake fancy cookies at an Oakland confectioner's. "There is no use waiting for something more 'ladylike' to turn up," she said, "while we need bread and butter." In a very short time a more congenial position offered itself in Southern California and Mrs. Syle and her daughter moved down there. Mr. Madison, Miss Syle's fiancee, is said to be a very clever chap, and he is wonderfully lucky to win such a girl as Elsie Syle, whose spirit and beauty places her above the common, or garden variety of girls.

"The Cage"

New novels seldom come my way. I prefer to read the old ones, letting my confrere, "The Bookworm," look after contemporary fiction. However, chance threw into my hands the other day a book that I am glad I read. It is by Charlotte Teller, an author whose name is new to me, and she has dubbed it "The Cage." The name comes from the definition of the law given by one of the principal characters, Eugene Harden, a rich Austrian who comes to this country to study social conditions, and becomes a strike leader. To quote:

"Anne asked him if, in Austria, he thought much about the law.

"'It is like a cage,' he answered. 'At first you are used to seeing the outside world streaked with the crossing of its bars, but after a while it becomes intolerable, and you have to get out—get away—come over here.'

"'You should destroy it,' said Frederica, 'for it will make men like monkeys to live in it.'

"'But when monkeys become men the cage will itself dissolve in air,' he said."

Harden finds, in time, that there are laws here, too. The novel deals with labor conditions in Chicago, and with the Haymarket riots in which dynamite bombs were thrown. The author is vehement in asserting that seven innocent men were hanged for that crime, the evidence against them being "planted" by the police. Still she is not altogether a sympathizer with unionism, dealing hard raps to both sides in the course of the story. She weaves in an excellent love affair, plenty of tragedy, humor of a wholesome sort, and genuine wit. Dr. Hartwell, a minister, his daughter Frederica and Anne Forester are slum workers, he having given up a good parish to come among the working people, and Anne in her enthusiasm leaving a home of luxury. The first half of the book, in which life among the poor is described, is of exceptional merit, written in easy, finished style, and full of whole-hearted sympathy with the workers. It does not glorify them by any means, the two girls in particular having a full realization of the shortcomings of their charges. The author has evolved several distinct characters, of the kind a reader remembers, and her tracing of the psychological development of Frederica from dreamer to a fierce unionist under Harden's influence is finely done. The second half of the book, which deals almost altogether with strikes, although containing fine passages, does not equal the first. The writer becomes melo-dramatic, and coincidence is worked to the limit. But even with this fault, it is a novel that leaves a distinct impression behind it, not only on account of the story told, but because of its excellent style and its kindly humor and keen satire. Mrs. Scanlan, wife of one of the strikers, talking of arbitration, says: "If your father'd ever been a union man he'd see it ain't no good to arbitrate, at least not until they've got the bosses in a corner." It is seldom that an author avowedly in sympathy with unionism will write anything like that, or like the following observation made by Frederica when she hears that her father is to bring a socialist home to supper: "'I hope he will ask him to wash his hands. He does it so beautifully. They think it is a kind of ceremony in the Hartwell house.'"

One year spent in the society of two geniuses would unbalance the strongest mind.

A Bit of Repartee

Ap[ro]pos of the recent marriage of Miss Mary Bell to Colonel James Morwood, chief surgeon of the British army in India, I am reminded of a passage at repartee which took place at the Sequoia Club when Miss Bell announced her intention of accompanying Mrs. Frederick Palmer and Miss Nellie Grant to Calcutta. "I thought women lost their complexions in India," said a sweet little manlet who prides himself on his pink and white loveliness. "Oh, but there are real men in India, and women frequently marry them!" answered Mrs. Palmer. And evidently she proved the matchmaker militant, for after a two weeks' acquaintance on shipboard Miss Bell's engagement to one of the "catches" in the Anglo Indian army was announced.

Her Social Prestige

I hear that Mrs. Palmer's cousin, Nellie Grant, is a great favorite in the land of the "More Than English." Mrs. Palmer has a beautiful home in Calcutta and as she is a favorite of Lady Minto's she is a social power in Calcutta. Even when Mrs. Palmer was Florence Mason and a student at the University of California, she showed highly developed social instincts and was the leading spirit in the Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority, to which exclusive organization Mary Bell also belonged. At that time Miss Mason's chief social asset, in addition to her personal charms, was a close kinship with the late General Grant. Not long after her graduation, however, she inherited a large fortune and it was while touring the world that she met and married Frederick Palmer in Calcutta.

She Was Literary

Mrs. Morwood, who will always be Mary Bell to her San Francisco friends, comes of a good old Southern family, but like most F. F. V.'s the Bells have not been troubled with vulgar lucre, so Mary's marriage to the wealthy English colonel will "help gild the family 'scutcheon." She is a very clever young woman, and at one time she had literary aspirations but aside from one or two promising short stories she has never published anything. She was a leading spirit in the Sequoia Club, and it will be difficult to fill the niche which Mary Bell occupied in that organization.

The McCreerys Expected

Richard McCreery is expected to pay a visit to his old home shortly with his new wife, Lady Grey-Egerton. McCreery has many friends at Burlingame who will no doubt be pleased to welcome his new wife, who was May Cuyler of New York, daughter of Major J. Wayne Cuyler, U. S. A. In 1893 she was married to Sir Philip Grey-Egerton, twelfth baronet of his line. In the spring of 1904 a separation took place and later Lady Egerton secured a divorce, her husband making no contest. There were two children by the marriage. Richard McCreery is a nephew of the late Justice Field. His mother has resided in Europe many years, during which period she has been separated from her husband, Andrew McCreery, who spends most of his time in this city. In 1894 Richard McCreery married Edith Kip, daughter of the late Colonel Lawrence Kip, granddaughter of Peter Lorillard. In 1904 Mrs. McCreery sued her husband for divorce, accusing him of being too friendly with a woman whose name was not given.

The Kehrleins

Francis Coon, whose engagement to Oliver Kehrlein has just been announced, will be a mid-summer bride. Miss Coon is a niece of the late Judge Coon and is also related to the McNutts and the Easton branch of the Crocker family. The Kehrlein boys are a recent acquisition of society's. They spent their early life abroad, returning for a college course at Stanford university, and then took degrees at Columbia. Although the family is reputed wealthy Mrs. Kehrlein has never gone about in society. I believe it was Mrs. Ynez Shorb White who "discovered" Oliver and Emil Kehrlein and decided that two such handsome chaps could not be spared from smart set gatherings, so this winter their names have been prominent at all social functions. "Ollie" Kehrlein, as he is called, is quite a serious minded young man with a determination to amount to something in his chosen line—structural engineering.

No Tour For Them

Ap[ro]pos of the McNutts, I hear that Mrs. Ashton Potter and Ruth McNutt have had to give up their intended automobile trip in the south of France as there is a small-pox scare in those parts. Instead they will join the Josselyns in Paris. Mrs. Joseph Redding will also be one of the party. Mrs. Redding and Mrs. Josselyn are life-long friends—in fact, the youngest daughter in the Josselyn family is named Myra, after Mrs. Redding.

She Now Prefers Westerners

The matchmakers insist that Jennie Crocker did not leave for the East entirely heart whole, and fancy free. As she has professed a preference for Western men ever since Francis Burton Harrison with indelicate haste effaced her sister's memory in a second marriage, it is just possible that the gossips have the right scent. Miss Crocker will be a bridesmaid at the McCook-Whitman wedding, which is one of the fashionable New York events calendared for the post-lenten season. The bride is a niece of C. B. Alexander, Jennie Crocker's uncle by marriage. The McCook girls owe their social welfare to the interest Mrs. Alexander has taken in them. This makes the second wedding this season at which Jennie Crocker has officiated as bridesmaid, her maiden effort being as an attendant at the Wilson-Cadwalader wedding. Miss Crocker will be one of the guests at the bride's table when Miss Katherine Barney of New York marries Courtland D. Barnes next week. Miss Barney is well known out here, as she spent a month with the Whitelaw Reids at Millbrae, the D. O. Mills country home. Jean Reid and Katherine Barney are inseparables and probably the girl who was admitted closest to their friendship while they were out here was Gertrude Eells, now Mrs. Jack Babcock. Gertrude Eells received for wedding presents were sent by Jean Reid. Miss Reid has a deep rooted conviction that her wealth makes her a target for fortune hunters and she looks with suspicion upon any man who shows more interest in her than the polite how-doness of society demands. Friends of the Reids tell me that Miss Reid is very much sought after on her own intrinsic account but nothing seems to convince her of the disinterested motives of her suitors.

Trinity Church Choir at the Greek Theatre

Trinity Church Choir will sing the following programme at the Greek Theatre, University of California, Berkeley, at four o'clock Sunday afternoon, March 24: Processional Hymn, Jerusalem the Golden (by request), Eaton; God Shall Wipe Away All Tears, chorus, Field; The Palms, bass solo and chorus (Faure), Wilfred Gleen, soloist; Behold, the Master Passeth By, contralto, solo and chorus (Stevenson), Miss Elizabeth Price, soloist; O Come Let Us Worship, tenor solo and chorus (Mendelssohn), Charles Trowbridge, soloist; Out of Heaven, soprano solo and chorus (Cowen), Mrs. John Darwin Gish, soloist; Prepare Ye the Way of the Lord, quartette and chorus (Garrett), by Mrs. Gish, Miss Price, Mr. Trowbridge and Mr. Glenn; Recessional Hymn, Brightly Gleams Our Banner, Eaton. Gaul's Passion Service will be sung at Trinity Church Good Friday night, March 29, at eight o'clock. The soloists will be Mrs. John Darwin Gish, Miss Elizabeth Price, Mr. Charles Trowbridge, Mr. Edgar Dawson, Mr. Wilfred Glenn, Mr. James Greenwell and Mr. Wallace Hicks. Louis H. Eaton, organist.

A. New Mass

The Easter music at St. Dominic's Church will this year be specially attractive. A new mass has been composed for the occasion by Dr. H. J. Stewart, and it will be rendered, under his direction, by an augmented choir and large orchestra. The mass, which is dedicated to the Rev. Father Pius Driscoll, O. P., has been written with the purpose of conforming as far as possible to the recent edict of the Pope upon the subject of church music. There is very little work for the soloists, and the composer has relied almost entirely upon massive choral and orchestral effects.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra

About the middle of April Manager Will Greenbaum will present the great Chicago Symphony Orchestra of fifty artists under the direction of Alexander von Fielitz, the eminent composer and conductor. With the organization will come a quartette of singers and some fine instrumental soloists. At least three concerts will be given in San Francisco, and for the first time in the history of the Greek Theatre there will be a Saturday matinee. This will be good news to many men who cannot get away on Thursday afternoons to enjoy a symphony orchestra but who can easily attend on a Saturday. Hundreds of school teachers and students will likewise take advantage of this opportunity. Notwithstanding the enormous expense of bringing such an organization to the Coast the highest priced seats will be $1.50, the same as is charged for local symphony concerts. The students of Stanford University will be given an opportunity of hearing this fine organization.

"Sapho" at the Colonial

A grand revival of "Sapho" is announced for the coming week at the Colonial Theatre. Izetta Jewell will play the title role. The regular stock company will be considerably augmented for this particular production. Manager Kurtzig states that the Olga Nethersole version of Sapho will be given in its entirety and that from a scenic as well as an artistic standpoint the Colonial's presentation of the great drama will be up to the highest standard. A dramatization of Count Tolstoi's absorbing story, "Kreutzer Sonata," will follow "Sapho" at the Colonial.

The Alcazar

The New Alcazar Theatre is a realization of the fondest dreams of its enterprising founders. Belasco and Mayer have established a fine home for their stock company, one in which the patrons of the drama may find entertainment with the smallest possible degree of discomfort, and feel that they need concern themselves with nothing save the performance for which they have paid the price. And these are considerations the importance of which is seldom appreciated by the purveyors of amusement. The New Alcazar is cosy as well as commodious. It affords plenty of elbow-room and such is the perfection of its acoustic properties that one may keep far enough away from the stage to enhance the illusions without fear of losing the thread of the story. The opening night at the Alcazar was a delightful occasion. The audience was composed principally of regulars of the old house, and they made it evident that they were on hand for two purposes; to felicitate the management and to size up the new company. Their felicitations were generous and the outward indications were that the performers met with their approval. As it is my business merely to record my own impressions I am reluctant to deal in personalities not strictly within the purview of my duty but I feel constrained to reprove Mr. Fred J. Butler who confesses that he spent three months in New York selecting plays for the season. He therefore pleads guilty to having selected "The Altar of Friendship" to serve as the inaugural production. The author, Madeleine Lucette Ryley, has written some fairly good plays, but "The Altar of Friendship" is not one of them. The story of it is jejune. The whole atmosphere of it is one of stale sentimentality of a kind for which I am seldom in the humor. It is clap-trap of purely theatrical extraction—an artificial substitute for genuine drama. To produce successful drama one must create persons whose fortunes we can follow as those of a friend or enemy. To divert us with automations is to seduce us with entertainment unworthy of attention. Madeleine Lucette Ryley burnt too much midnight oil over the epigrams of this play, and while it is not without its flashes of wit the dialogue is lacking in freshness and spontaneity. In such a play it is pretty hard to pass judgment on the performers without doing them an injustice. Bertram Lytell, the leading man, is satisfying to the eye and invests a conventional role with some degree of earnestness and naturalness. I imagine that he will improve on acquaintance. Laura Lang, the leading woman, is a determined young lady with plenty of assurance and sufficient cleverness to simulate the not very subtle emotions of her part plausibly enough, but in scenes of buoyancy of feeling her manner is somewhat artificial, and she exerts very little magnetic influence. Perhaps the most accomplished of the new artists is Daisy Lovering, the ingenue, who managed to win sympathy despite the impossibility of vitalizing her part. John Maher is with the new company and in him Belasco and Mayer have a prize, but even he is unable to make his artistry felt in this play. Adele Belgarde in an actress-proof part contributes much to the life of the performance, and the other members of the company do what is so easily generalized in the term "conscientious work." Perhaps the most creditable feature of the performance is the stage management which achieves an imaginative realization of the circumstances of the drama. I do not believe the play ever received a more sumptuous production.

Next Week

The first matinee in the new theatre will take place on Saturday afternoon. There will also be a matinee on Sunday. For the second week Belasco and Mayer offer the New Alcazar Company in Captain Robert Marshall's play, "The Unforseen." This will be the first San Francisco production of this play. It was originally produced at the Haymarket Theatre in London by Cyreo Maude and Evelyn Milliard. This play will doubtless prove a winner, for Captain Marshall is a playwright of the first rank. He proved that in his former successes, "The Second in Command," "The Royal Family" and "His Excellency the Governor." Bertram Lytell will be seen in the part originally played by Cyreo Maude and Laura Lang will assume the character which Miss Milliard played in the original performance. The other members of the cast will all have congenial roles. The scenic production will be in keeping with the standard which the Alcazar has already set by their production of "The Altar of Friendship." The following week the first stock production of "The Pit" as originally played by Wilton Lackaye will be seen. This play is dramatized from Frank Norris's exceedingly interesting and popular novel of the same name.

A Veteran of the Stage

A testimonial benefit will be given the veteran actor James M. Ward at the Colonial Theatre on Monday evening, March 25. "Sapho" will be played. Mr. Ward is one of the oldest and best-known actors in the country. He has been in retirement many years. Mr. Ward was identified with the theatrical profession for a period extending over half a century. He was the first man to play the role of Harvey Green in "Ten Nights in a Bar Room" in this country. That was in 1858. Many men prominent in the profession owe their success in a great measure to the careful instruction of old "Daddy" Ward as he is affectionately called by the people behind the footlights. A. Burt Wesner, now playing with the Colonial Stock Company, was one of his pupils. Frank Bacon also owes considerable of his histrionic success to Mr. Ward's painstaking efforts. In his prime Mr. Ward played with Modjeska, Booth, Forrest and Davenport. He was quite a favorite in this city when he was with the old Grand Opera House Stock Company.

At the Novelty

The "Yankee Tourist" company having been storm-bound in the wilds of Nevada the Novelty Theatre was in darkness most of the week. Keen was the disappointment of theatregoers over the non-arrival of this company of which Raymond Hitchcock is the star and which includes among its members that dainty artist Flora Zabelle. "A Yankee Tourist" is reported to be one of the best things in the musical comedy line that left New York this season, but whatever be the merits of the piece it is sufficient to know that Hitchcock and Miss Zabelle are the chief fun producers. It would take a very large bushel in the form of a musical comedy to hide their light. As their engagement is to fill all next week and as the roads are not likely to remain in their impassable state much longer, the probability is that most of us will have an opportunity to renew the pleasant acquaintance of seasons ago.

On Monday, April 1, Florence Roberts and a specially engaged company will begin a limited engagement at the Novelty Theatre. The popular actress has two new plays for production here, one of which is "Maria Rosa," by the author of "Marta of the Lowlands." The advance sale of seats begins Thursday morning.

Conversion of The Chutes

Following the engagement of The San Carlo Opera Company at the Chutes Theatre Messrs. Harry Bishop and Will Greenbaum will take possession of the big playhouse for a long period of years and will conduct it as a first class stock house devoted to melodramas of the better class, spectacular productions and big dramatic performances. An excellent stock company has been engaged from the East and the residents of that growing section of our city, Richmond District, will now have a good theatre right at their doors. One of the features of the Chutes Theatre will be the orchestral music. Will Greenbaum having selected a fine body of musicians and engaged Mr. Frederick Hoff, an Eastern conductor of reputation, to wield the baton. While the Chutes Theatre will be pre-eminently a stock house the size of the theatre is such that occasionally big Eastern attractions will be accommodated and perhaps an annual season of grand opera arranged for.

"Nanon at Idora"

In a few days we shall be hearing again that old familiar tune, "Nanon My Darling I Sing to Thee." It is one of the catchy melodies of the past that has lost none of its charm, and therefore it is safe to predict that after it is heard at Idora Park next week, there will be whistlers galore adding it to their repertoire. "Nanon" is the opera scheduled for revival next week and "Wang" will follow.

Artistic Vaudeville

Of more than usual artistic interest is the programme of next week's vaudeville entertainment at the Orpheum; but this does not mean that there will be a dearth of the frolic and fun which predominate in the average vaudeville performance. Dan Burke and his school girls, who head the bill, are conceded to present one of the daintiest dancing numbers ever presented in vaudeville. Mr. Burke is a clever dancer and revives the best form of dancing which is nearer the poetry of motion than most people imagine. He has six clever and attractive young girls who know how to sing and follow closely in his steps. The stage settings and costumes are described as beautiful in the extreme. Merri Osborne, who has been favorably compared by Allan Dale and other critics with Anna Held and Yvette Guilbert, and who created a furore as Fifi in "The Belle of New York" at the Shaftesbury Theatre, London, and also has to her credit several New York Casino successes, will appear with her own company in a dainty playlet, "Taming An Actress." The London press pronounced her a charming pianist, clever raconteur full of brilliant witticisms and an artiste who achieves the extraordinary. The Joseph Adelman Trio, who have won recognition for the xylophones among musical critics, are just back from a five years' tour of Europe and will be heard in their popular stunt. Julius Tannon will make huge drafts on his marvelous gift of mimicry, and Howard & Bland will appear in a new sketch called "The Stage Manager." There is to be another week of the great Wessems and also of the Sharp brothers.

Grand Opera

The San Carlo Opera Company has proved itself capable of living up to Will Greenbaum's eulogiums. Over in Oakland the company made an excellent record and the verdict of the music lovers of that city was that the performances will stand comparison with some of the best that were given at the old Grand Opera House at more than double the Greenbaum prices. For completeness of detail the San Carlo company has not been surpassed in this city. Chorus, orchestra and ensemble are of the highest artistic character and the principle soloists are as we know of top-notch quality in the estimation of opera-goers. Perhaps we may not agree as to the artistic calibre of a Nordica or of a Nielsen but there is no disputing over the high notes of a Constantino. The quality of his voice is of the purest gold and his artistry is beyond cavil. The performances in this city were too late for criticism in Town Talk.

The second week of the season will be devoted to the following works: Monday evening, "Rigoletto," with Alice Nielsen, Constantino and Fornari; Tuesday, "Il Trovatore," with Mme. Nordica, Signor Martin, Signor Calperini and Mme. Monti-Baldini; Wednesday evening, "Lucia," with Nielsen and Constantino; Thursday evening, "La Traviata," with Nordica and Allemanni; Friday, a repetition of "La Boheme"; Saturday matinee, "Don Pasquale" and "Cavalleria Rusticana," with Mlle. Tarquini as Santuzza and Alice Nielsen of course as Norina in the first-named opera; Saturday evening another performance of "Carmen," with Deyrene and Martin, and the farewell production will be Easter Sunday matinee with an all-star cast, "Les Huguenots." In this Mmes. Nordica, Nielsen and Peyrene will sing and also Constantino, Fornari, de Seguirola, etc. It will be one of the greatest operatic performances ever heard here.

The prices are very moderate, ranging from $3.00 down to $1.00, and the box office is conveniently located at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s on Van Ness avenue above California street.

Manager Greenbaum announces that he expects to arrange for an annual season by this organization.

The Petschnikoffs

Alexander Petschnikoff, the greatest of Russian violinists, and his wife will give the first of the post-lenten musical entertainments. Among the works for two violins that these artists will play are the "Double Concerto" by Bach, "Double Concerto" by Spohr, Suite for two violins by H. Zilcher and compositions for two violins and piano by J. S. Bach (one in C major, the other in G major.) Petschnikoff is renowned for his brilliant interpretation of Bach; and by request will play the favorite "Chaconne" at one of his concerts. He will also be heard in the Mendelssohn and other concertos as well as in some smaller works. The concerts will be given at Lyric Hall on Saturday and Sunday afternoons, April 6 and 7, and Tuesday evening, April 9. Seats will be on sale at Kohler and Chase's, corner Sutter and Franklin, on and after Monday, April 1. At the University Symphony Concert, April 11, these artists will play the double concerto by Mozart for violin and viola and Mr. Petschnikoff will play the Tchaikowsky Violin Concerto both numbers being accompanied by the full orchestra.

The Free Lance

"Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" at the Van Ness Theatre has repeated last season's success and is proving a strong attraction. The Liebler and Company production of this unique comedy-drama is cast this season to perfection and once more Madge Carr Cooke is making a big hit in the title role. Her performance is one of the most delightfully interesting and artistic known to the American stage. The management of the Van Ness Theatre announces one of its most important attractions of the season to follow on Monday, April 1. It is none other than Klaw and Erlanger's presentation of Sousa's latest comic opera success, "The Free Lance," in which Joseph Cawthorn is star at the head of a big company including all the original New York cast. Among the principals are Nella Bergen, Jeanette Lowrie, Albert Hart, George Tallman, George Schiller, Stanley Murphy, Monte Elmo. In collaboration with Harry B. Smith, the well-known librettist, the famous bandmaster is said to have turned out one of the most fascinating works since the days of "Robin Hood."

New Plays and Players for the American

Frank W. Healy, manager of the San Francisco Opera Company, now playing at the American Theatre, was most successful on his recent trip to New York in his quest for new pieces and players for the American Theatre. With Mr. Healy, who returned last Tuesday, came Florence Sinnott, one of the prettiest and most talented operatic soubrettes on the stage. Miss Sinnott will be remembered as the little woman who succeeded Nellie McCoy in the Schubert Brothers' production of "The Earl and the Girl" and Anna Laughlin in "The Wizard of Oz." She was the original Daisy in Pixley and Luder's Dearborn Theatre production of "The Burgomaster." Among the other new people engaged by Mr. Healy are J. Albert Wallerstedt, the handsome young baritone who pleased Tivoli audiences during his season there and who made a genuine hit in Richard Carle's "The Mayor of Tokio," and the Lulu Glaser production of "Dolly Varden," and Joseph Miller, assistant general stage director for the Schubert Brothers, who has been loaned for the production of the Schubert musical comedies. Mr. Miller will work in conjunction with George Lask. At present Mr. Lask and Miller are busily engaged getting up a mammoth production of the Schubert Brothers' Japanese-American musical comedy "Fantana," which opens at the American Easter Sunday matinee, following a grand revival of Balfe's delightful ballad opera, "The Bohemian Girl." The production of "Fantana" promises to eclipse anything yet attempted at the American.

The Clever Young Actress at the New Alcazar Theatre

As Gold in the Fire

By A. Russell Weekes

The strong morning sunlight washed the sky with azure, the autumnal earth with gold; a rough flint-strewn track ran down, between black aisles of forest, over the flanks of the great scarred hill which barred the south, and led thence northwards through the valley between heights of cliff and pine. Stainless against the sky, the pale fairyland of ever-lasting snow lay in sunny reaches of lucent silence, folding serene wings, like a rested dove, over the riven and storm-swept slopes of the lower spurs of the range.

Two riders, leisurely riding from north and south along the white road, alone broke the solitariness of the place. One was a man of eight and thirty, with sandy hair, blue eyes, and a calm, shrewd, kindly Scottish smile; the other, who might have been a few years younger, wore a big hat tilted over his black eyes, and was mounted on a big black horse, which had the air of being just as handsome, venturesome, rapid, and devil-may-care as his master, and not more so.

As they drew near to each other, the sandy-haired man raised his hand to his eyes, and scanned the face of his vis-a-vis with a sharp, dissatisfied look.

"You here, Gabriel!—What mischief is it now?"

"Holding up the mail, Brett, of course; don't you see my derringers?" said the younger man, with a laugh as clear as a girl's.

"Ay, I see them all I want to," the Scotchman answered, frowning. "You may laugh, my young friend, but it was an ill day for you when you left my ranch. Ye're a lost sheep, I doubt."

"Bless you, ranching's too dull for me; I wasn't cut out to be a clerk."

"Dull, is it? Find starvation more exciting?"

"Do I look as if I were starving?"

"You look"—Brett studied him critically—"as if you were going straight to perdition. Yet I'd find you a job if you come back, for old sake's sake."

"Thanks, you're generous," Gabriel answered, drily.

"I've a regard for the state of your soul; it's honest work anyway."

"It wouldn't suit me; but you can lend me a tenner, if you like."

Brett was a man who valued his six-pences; nevertheless, he plunged his hand into his pocket and got out a roll of notes. The color came into Gabriel's face; he waved them away.

"No, Brett, no, I won't borrow. You're the dearest old fellow that ever stepped, but I won't take your money. Let me go my own way, to perdition if you like; I'm past stopping."

Brett shrugged again. "You're a fool," he said, laconically; he was a man of few words. He pushed his horse forward and rode up the hill towards the blinding sunlight without a word of farewell.

Left alone, Gabriel urged his horse off the track on to a grassy slope, and ensconced himself finally behind a thicket of scented shrubs, whence he could see, himself unseen, the whole length of the road from mountain crest to crest. He took out his revolvers, looked carefully to their loading, and tested their accuracy by letting fly a single shot at the jewelled wings of a humming bird, which sparkled, a winged atom of flame, in the verdurous gloom of pine-branches twenty yards away. It dropped with a piteous flutter of marred plumage, and Gabriel patted his revolver with a satisfied nod; he was proud of his own consummate skill as a marksman. He took out his watch; it was of gold, studded with diamonds; an "L" and "V" of emeralds entwined on the back indicated the existence of a previous owner, for Gabriel's surname happened to be Massareen; an awkward coincidence, but one which sat very lightly on the conscience of its present possessor. On the other hand, the discovery that it wanted still several hours of noon, when the mail was due, caused him to swear roundly, in terms which he had assuredly not learnt at Massareen Castle.

Younger son of a widowed mother, Gabriel had early developed an incorrigible aptitude for scrapes inconsistent with a protracted career at College. He came home, and was received, with a lachrymose scolding which bored him, into an atmosphere of helpless dissatisfaction. The idle, extravagant boy was put to the Bar, which was not, perhaps, the most suitable of professions; after a year's expensive knocking about town he brought about a crisis by figuring in court on a charge of "drunk and disorderly." Gabriel had not been very drunk, but the other part of the charge was flagrantly just; he paid his fine, had an interview with his mother, and was packed off on the spot to Colorado, with five thousand pounds in his pocketbook, and scant prospect of a welcome on his return. He fell into the hands of Peter Brett, a Scotchman, who pitied the wild lad, and took him on his ranch, and kept him steady for a twelvemonth; but the wild blood broke out again, and Gabriel fled to the nearest township, and took out his spell of virtue in a wild burst of drink, gambling, and a host of minor and major evils. Brett was long-suffering, but he was economical, respectable, and Calvinistic; worst of all, he was proud and shy, and Gabriel never came back to the ranch. He went from bad to worse, losing the native gift of pity, tenderness, and self-contempt which had won him sympathy even from those he wronged; at thirty he was an outlaw and a desperado, and there was little romantic about him except his picturesque hat and his fascinating black eyes.

As he waited, reining in his impatient steed, he looked about him with keen, incurious eyes. The life of the woods went on all round him, for he sat still as a stone, and the forest creatures took him for a carved image which could not hurt them; a snake uncurled hissing in the grass, a grey fox showed his mask, already silvering towards its winter coat, between the tree-stems, a black squirrel ran up a tree in front of his horse's nose and sat chattering at him among the branches. Last came a great butterfly, his downy wings stained with black and vermillion, and settled for a moment on Gabriel's bridle. The nameless instinct of brutality urged him to lift his riding whip and strike down the beautiful harmless creature; he did it, half hating himself, half indifferent. His horse felt the stroke and reared suddenly. Gabriel was not unseated, but he had his work cut out for him to keep his saddle. When he had reduced his steed to order, the woods were silent and forsaken; the air seemed to have grown suddenly hot and heavy. Looking up, he saw in the south a cloud of black gloom shot with a ruddy gold rising and dilating in the sky; the sun shone like a new farthing, and faded into dimness.

"A brush fire, by all that's unlucky! If it spreads at this rate, I shall have to make tracks for the river."

He looked at his watch; the mail was not due for an hour yet. Resolving to give it as long a chance as possible, he resigned himself to wait. Meanwhile, the fire beat up in the sky, the sun was darkened, and he could smell the faint acrid savour of the smoke. The wood was full of little hurrying things, escaping from the danger that pursued them. His own horse, sweating and trembling, could scarcely be withheld from bolting. At last he saw the mail, half an hour before its time, come over the brow of the hill and race along the road; the four grey horses which drew it were maddened by fear, which their driver appeared to share, for he gave them a loose rein and a heavy hand on the whip. Rocking from side to side, the heavy vehicle soon reached the foot of the slope, and as it checked to take the opposite ascent, Gabriel put his horse to a canter and rode out from his shelter, leveling a revolver in either hand.

"Hands up, gentlemen!" he called out, in clear and ringing tones. "Stop it, Red Mick, or I'll drop you at twenty yards."

He was so plainly prepared to fulfill his threat to the letter, that the red-headed driver wound his wrist in the reins, and curbed in his four-in-hand with a violence that threw them all on their haunches, struggling and straining. Gabriel sat his horse with a smiling face, entirely composed and amused.

"For the Lord's sake, let's get on, boys," called out a big black-bearded Texan. "We shall be roasted alive in ten minutes."

"Allow me first to relieve you of that fat purse which I perceive to be sticking out of your pocket," said Gabriel, urbanely. "Throw it down, you ——, or I'll blow your brains out."

The Texan was brave; but he was covered; a single movement of his hand towards his hip-pocket would have been his death. Knowing it, he pulled out his purse and threw it down by the way-side, with a bitter oath. Gabriel sat as still as a statue while the entire company, to the number of a dozen full-grown men, disbursed their month's earnings in camp or shanty. Red Mick gave up the money he had taken for their fares, and a white-faced boy, on his way to the Mission School, emptied his little valise upon the pile. Gabriel nodded.

"One moment," he said, courteously, when the tale was made up. "Sorry to detain you, but I advise you to wait while I'm talking; I've exactly a shot apiece for you, and I never miss. Where does the fire run, Mick?"

"Brett's ranch," said Mick, laconically, "and southwards."

"Ha! Where's Brett, then?"

"In hell," said the driver; adding, but in a voice discreetly lowered, "where I wish you was too."

Gabriel's face whitened suddenly, and his fine white teeth caught and pressed down his underlip. "Good day to you," he said. "Good luck go with you, mes amis! So long."

The mail went off at a racketing hand-gallop. Gabriel did not trouble to look after its retreat; as a result he got a flight of bullets singing about his ears, but, owing to the excitement of the marksmen and the unsteadiness of their postures, they missed. He emptied his revolver after them in a savage kind of salute, and heard a feeble cry come ringing back against the wind; it was the little school boy, whose shoulder he had perforated. Gabriel gave the matter no second thought. Leaving his spoil where it lay, he dismounted, tightened his stirrups, adjusted his reins, lightened himself of all superfluous clothing, and springing again into his saddle, urged his horse up the hill into the teeth of the conflagration.

It was madness, and he knew it; but it was a calculated madness. He foresaw, what Red Mick had never considered, that Brett, experienced bushman as he was, would scarcely have been taken by surprise; he must have been warned in time at least to try and effect an escape. As Gabriel rode up over the brow of the hill, he saw the fire below and before him, rolling like a great sea of red and yellow flames, and whirled about in a shroud of smoke. It was still several miles away, but the broad plain, covered with arid forest, offered no check to its march, and it advanced with the pace and fury almost of a whirlwind. The sky all black, the air all tainted, the horizon girdled in flame and smoke; such was the spectacle on which he looked. He urged his horse fleetly forward in the direction of the river, which bounded Brett's property on the north. Thither, if anywhere, had Brett ridden for safety out of the heart of the flames, which must have made of his house a drift of red-hot ashes an hour and more ago.

Forward under the arching deodars, forward over the scented carpet of the firs, forward through creeping gusts of smoke, through herds of flying deer, across broad tracts where his horse maddened before the mass of the approaching fire and struggled to get away, forward through tinder and singeing shrubs and under furnace-blasts of scorching air. The breath of the fire was hot on Gabriel's cheek, and he riding level with its advance line was plainly riding into death; yet he held on, swinging low over his horse's mane, and gripping its flanks with bare knees, a light of unalloyed enjoyment flashing in his untamed eyes. At last he was rewarded by a sight of the broad river, sullen as a flood of steel, cutting its way between walls of fire-scarred smoke; and by the river side, as chance would have it, at the old boathouse which he knew so well, he saw Brett standing powerless beside a boat too heavy for him to launch, waiting for the end. Gabriel rose in his stirrups with a wild shout, which Brett heard, and turned his head; and down the slope this novel sort of Claude Duval came thundering, his black curl's tossing in the wind.

"Gabriel! Madness!" cried Brett, with a vexed laugh in spite of the imminence of peril. "Why, you—you fool!"

Gabriel dropped from his horse and clapped him on the back. "No, no," he said, "We'll do it yet, old man!"

The river-side trees burned slower than those inland, being sappy and well-watered. Working for their lives, the two men labored at the boat; it had been drawn up the bank for mending, and would properly have given four men their hands full. But fire, death, and hope are strange masters; and Brett's tough sinews were more than matched by Gabriel's supple frame. The flames rushed on; the air was full of crackling and hissing, backed by the stupendous roar of the whole forest blazing behind; trees lurched and toppled into the river three hundred yards away. It was a Homeric moment. There was a sudden whining, trembling, straining noise, and then a sudden splash: the "Caledonia" was launched. Her crew sprang in; Gabriel's horse stood on the bank whinnying, too exhausted to swim. Gabriel turned, his teeth closing again over his lip with that singular look of strong and painful resolve. A shot rang out, and the horse reared and fell, while the master bent again to his oars.

They gained the mid-stream, and lay down in the boat while the flames roared by. Thick black clouds of darkness, laced and shot with sparks and rockets of fire, replaced the blue sky over their heads for a time of which they had no reckoning. It was over at last, and they sat up to find themselves abreast of a smoking desolation on either side of the river. The plains, the hills, the forests were laid bare; vegetation, trees, houses, pasture, flocks, herds, and human beings, if there were any, had been obliterated by the passage of the terror, and the face of the country was blotted and blurred, as a child's finger rubs out the sums on a slate. Ahead of them they saw the skirts of the fire, pouring out its fury upon fresh hills and plains, fresh homesteads, other human lives.

"Ten years' work swept away in as many hours!" said Brett, with a short laugh. "Eh, but I doubt I'll not see Edinburgh again as soon as I thought."

"I stuck up the mail this morning," said Gabriel, listless and stripped of reserve like his companion; the reticencies of life seemed just then superfluous. "It's the first time I've stolen, and now I've lost the price of my theft."

"You've saved my life, anyway," Brett said quickly. "Oh, man, you've been a fool! What brought you back in the teeth of certain death?"

"You, Peter, and a thought of the old days. I knew you'd make for the boathouse."

"Well, I'm ruined, I guess," Brett said, doggedly, "but I guess that only means I'll start again tomorrow." He turned to Gabriel with a shade of diffidence in his tone. "You're too good for a thief, Gabriel; come and stand by me again. After all, we're both from the Old Country."

"I've been an awful brute; but I think I'll come if you'll have me," Gabriel said, tossing his curls out of his eyes.

"Done," said the Scot, briefly; and he shook his fist at the departing flames. "Eh, Nature, my lass, you're a grand hand at the meddling; but there's One that over-ruleth all things, and maybe this day I'll have snatched a brand from the burning."

Gabriel looked across the slow and sullen river to the desolation of the plain beyond, where flocks and herds lay dead in the fields about the smoking home-

A Memento from the Ruins

plot by the "business" or signs. It is a curious fact that the best Chinese actors, the best stock companies and the best productions were to be witnessed in the days of the Jackson Street Theatre, not in Pekin or Canton, but in this city. In China the actor is a vagabond and San Francisco was for many years a very inviting field to the humble stars of the stage. Their proficiency is a combination of memory, tradition and ingenuity. The classic pieces, as produced in this city, were the same as they were hundreds of years ago, and the best equipped actor is the one with the most extensive repertoire who not only knows the lines but also the "business," and who is able to improvise in those plays that are merely in skeleton form. Chinese actors are educated men possessed of a ready wit. They have an accurate knowledge of the history of China and of the etiquette and ceremonial of the imperial court. It is a common delusion that Chinese plays are of such great length that they run through several continuous performances. This delusion arises from the circumstance that there are "cycles" of plays—to borrow the Wagnerian phrase. There are many short Chinese dramas—so short that two or three are performed in one night. In the repertory of a company are comprised seven or eight hundred plays.

From Ah Chong I learn that there are Chinese thespians scattered all over the Coast and that they are waiting eagerly for the call back to the madding crowd of the new Chinatown now so rapidly taking form. He says that no Chinese community can afford to be without its places of amusement. It is the belief of the Chinese that every Joss is a patron of the drama and that there would be Sheol to pay if on the birthday of a Joss his devotees failed to take him to a show.

Transporting seven-passenger 40 H. P. motor cars from factory to freight depots on a 5-ton motor truck is the Winton custom. Streets leading to the Winton factory have been badly torn up this winter, and to drive new cars through the mud entails the work of washing and drying each car at the depot before shipment. The monster truck overcomes this difficulty. Its big platform readily accommodates a Model M or Type X-I-V and its motor has sufficient power to pull the load through the worst of ruts. This truck, by the way, has many novel features, not the least of which is a winch for which power is provided by the same motor that propels the truck.

A NEW HOTEL IN BERKELEY

Berkeley has at last got what it has long needed, a first class family, and to an extent, transient hotel. It is the Carlton, opened by Mrs. W. F. Morris, who formerly conducted the Hotel Cecil, 960 Bush street, San Francisco, so successfully. The hotel has one hundred and thirty-three rooms arranged in thirty-six suites of three and four room and bath and forty-two single rooms. There is a spacious lobby on the street floor, containing the office with mosaic floor, a reading-room, billiard room and the dining-rooms. One of these is an artistic and cozy private dining-room, where afternoon tea will be served for guests and friends from two till five. The formal opening will not be until the 30th, but there are already seventy-two permanent people in the house. The location of the place is very desirable, being at the corner of Durant and Telegraph avenues. The Telegraph avenue cars pass the door and College avenue and Bancroft Way are but a few steps off, while the University grounds are but a block away.

CONFIDENCE IN SAN FRANCISCO

Evidence of faith and confidence in the Metropolis was certainly displayed by Mr. Paul T. Carroll when he backed up his judgment by fitting out the finest hat store San Francisco has ever had at 708 Market street, in the Mutual Savings Bank Building, for the sale of the Knox hat. Mr. Carroll is at present and has been for some years past the Knox Hat Agent in Oakland. He has been a resident of San Francisco and Oakland since boyhood and is well and favorably known on both sides of the bay. He has been particularly active in athletic circles. He is also a well-known member of the fraternal order of Elks. It is evident that he will give to San Francisco people what they have long needed, that is a first class hat store.

To the Unknown Soul

By E. R. Sill

(Requested)

O soul, that somewhere art my very kin,
From dusk and silence unto thee I call!
I know not where thou dwellest: if within
A palace or a hut; if great or small
Thy state and store of fortune; if thou'rt sad
This moment or most glad;
The lordliest monarch or the lowest thrall.

But well I know—since thou'rt my counterpart—
Thou bearist a clouded spirit; full of doubt
And old misgiving, heaviness of heart
And loneliness of mind; long wearied out
With climbing stairs that lead to nothing sure,
With chasing lights that lure,
In the thick murk that wraps us all about.

As across many instruments a flute
Breathes low, and only thrills its selfsame tone,
That wakes in music while the rest are mute,
So send thy voice to me! Then I alone
Shall hear and answer; and we too will fare
Together, and each bear
Twin burdens, lighter now than either one.

—The Severn Restaurant at 1050 Geary Street is crowded nightly with after-theatre parties.

A Roman Mirror

By Rennell Rodd

They found it in her hollow marble bed,
There where the numberless dead cities sleep,
They found it lying where the spade struck deep,
A broken mirror by a maiden dead.

These things—the beads she wore about her throat
Alterned blue and amber all untied.

A lamp to light her way and on one side
The toll men pay to that strange ferry-boat.

No trace today of what in her was fair!
Only the record of long years grown green
Upon the mirror's lustreless dead sheen,
Grown dim at last, when all else withered there.

Dead, broken, lustreless! It keeps for me
One picture of that immemorial land,
For oft as I have held thee in my hand
The dull bronze brightens, and I dream to see

A fair face gazing in thee wondering wise,
And o'er one marble shoulder all the while Strange lips that whisper till her own lips smile,
And all the mirror laughs about her eyes.

It was well thought to set thee there, so she Might smoothe the windy ripples of her hair
And knot their tangled waywardness, or ere
She stood before the Queen Persephone.

And still it may be where the dead folk rest
She holds a shadowy mirror to her eyes,
And looks upon the changelessness, and sighs,
And sets the dead land lilies on her breast.

The Fashion Makers of Paris

she married, the foundress of the Printemps. This dressmaker's name was Bouteux. Arsene Houssaye fished her out somewhere, when manager of the Francais, for the dresses of ingenues and jeunes premieres. I recollect, and always shall, a lovely dress symbolical of snow-flake innocence which Madame Bouteux, I was told, turned out for 80 frs., Mlle. Fix, however, providing the white satin underskirt. Worth would have charged five or six hundred francs, and would have disdained to utilize the white satin underskirt. This woman was a genius, a wit, too, and a humorist. She was a cousin of Alphonsine, the comic actress, whom she resembled to the degree of appearing her twin sister. One could not now find a woman of her dressmaking ability in a dingy entresol. She would be discharging, at perhaps a salary of 18,000, 20,000, or even 25,000 frs. a year, the duties of forewoman or saleswoman in some grand Rue de la Paix or Place Vendome house, or acting as first femme de chambre to the wife of some freshly-risen millionaire. I heard not long ago of a Parisian femme de chambre, who lost her life in the Valparaiso earthquake, and who was earning 30,000 frs. in the service of some mining king's wife out there.

These first-class second rate houses, the only ones presided over by French women are scarcely known to foreigners. They receive the trade of the rich women of the Faubourg St. Germain set, who, by the way, are no longer confined to the "noble Faubourg"—which is now a mere name—but are scattered all over Paris. For many years the best of these second-rate houses was that of Mlle. Ogier of the Avenue d l'Alura. It was managed by a Mlle. Julie and had the patronage of the Sugar Queens Lebaudy, of those Thoms who owe their great fortunes to the Haussmannisation of Paris, of the daughters of Senator Chris, the millionaire distiller of scents at Grasse, and of Mme. Fourichon, wife of the First President of the Court of Appeal. Mlle. Julie, a red-haired, pale-faced and almost middle-aged Franche-Comtoise, always dressed in black alpaca, would have struck you as remarkable. She could read a stranger as easily as an invoice, saw at once what would suit a customer, calculated with unerring promptness and accuracy the cost to the house, fair profits, and the price the person coming to her ought to pay. Her clear blue, honest, and courageous eye, and yet an eye that had an obliging expression and could be very kind, commanded confidence. She had faultless taste, was an unerring judge of the quality of the silk, satin, woollen, and other stuffs that she displayed, always gave an honest opinion when asked, but abstained from giving unasked advice. The last time I saw her the eyes welled over constantly. She had lost her old father, whom she supported and took out every Sunday to walk in some of the forests round Paris.

The difference of price is, of course, great between the articles furnished by the grand couturier and a Mlle. Julie. It might easily be from 300 fr. or 400 fr. for a visiting dress, and from 700 fr. to 1,000 fr. for a soiree dress. Nitrate, coal manganese, or other mineral Queens from Chili, need not stop to consider such trifles. Frenchwomen, however wealthy, do. The wealthiest widow now in France is no longer Mme. Lebaudy, but a Mme. Rousselle. She goes to couturiers. Mme. du Gast, who is almost a milliardiere, and is now in Morocco trying to tame Rasuli and Bou Amena, saves money by adopting third sex costumes—or pretty nearly. She has her motor, her yachting, her sou'wester, her zouave, her shooting costumes, and wears at home when nothing ceremonious goes on there an elegant deshabelle provided by a couturier of standing.

Frenchwomen are above all things rational, but tolerate every eccentricity that can be indulged in regardless of expense. When the eccentric spendthrift has thrown away his fortune he has to work, and is frowned at if he gets into debt. It was foreign ladies who inaugurated the dress saturnalia of the Second Empire. The Empress was a Spaniard, the Princess Metternich an Austro-Polo-Hungarian, the Marquise de Gallifet semi-Scotch, the Countess Rimsky Korsakoff a Russian, the Marquise de Chasseloup-Laubat a New Orleans creole the second Mme. Emile de Girardin the morganatic daughter of a pretty German sovereign; and so on. As the mania sprang up Californian gold and Nevada silver began to pour into Paris. Worth's opportunity was thus created, and the evolution of the illustrated press was as fuel to the flame.

— GREEN, AND YELLOW —

This famous Cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the Monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as LIQUEUR PERES CHARTREUX (the Monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well), distilled by the same order of Monks who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years and who alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar.

"The Port of Missing Men"

Meredith Nicholson has the happy faculty of choosing titles which are an allurements in themselves. "The Port of Missing Men" would tempt readers even without a syllable as to what might be its contents or character. The title is taken from the legend concerning a valley in the Virginia mountains, in the fastnesses of which, after the surrender at Appamattox a small detachment of Confederate soldiers withdrew, refusing to be bound by the action of General Lee. It was in this valley, which between whiles had been the preserve of a hunting club which had failed, and had been purchased by John Armitage, the hero of the story, that the last chapters of the romance of his life were worked out. The plot concerns the inevitable scheming and intrigue which may be expected when the throne of Austro-Hungary is vacated, and though it cannot be classed as either history or prophecy, yet may be a little of both. For the purposes of his story, Mr. Nicholson has probably availed himself of the disappearance of the Archduke John, who though long since dead, is from time to time resurrected and recognized here and there. Indeed, within the last year or so, even Rudolph has been "recognized" in America in spite of the unquestioned certainty of his suicide at Meyerling. There is a band of conspirators in Vienna whose plan is to enthrone one Frances, nephew of the emperor, even though to secure his succession there must be judicious "removals" of intervening heirs. Then the conspirators will reign from behind the throne for the correct Francis is but a tool in their hands. The weak link in their chain is the possibility that the missing archduke, Karl, for the purposes of the story, or his son, Frederick Augustus, may appear unexpectedly, in which case there would be two more lives to pass before Francis could inherit. John Armitage is a disturbing factor. He is an unknown quantity, not only to the Viennese conspirators but to others as well. We find him closeted and in intimate communication with the prime minister of Austria in a Geneva hotel. He is on terms of intimacy with the aged diplomat, and yet at the same time it is evident that von Stroebe does not approve of him. Armitage is certainly not a member of the secret police, yet he is intrusted with important secrets and undertakes the recovery of a stolen document. He seems to have no connection with any government service, and the Claibornes, who have noticed him in the various European capitals and who are destined to become intimately connected with his fortunes in the end, amuse themselves by speculating as to his nationality and probable business. To their surprise he incidentally mentions his ranch in Montana, and his knowledge of the West from Canada to Mexico, and it is evident that he has an abundance of money to spend and to spare. Armitage is a man of courage, coolness and daring, and he needs all three qualities, for as a result of a slight accident he suddenly becomes an object of the utmost importance to the Viennese conspirators, who have reason to suspect that he MAY be the Frederick Augustus, son of the Archduke Charles who would inherit the throne from his father, and with his character, be anything but a puppet in their or any other hands. Naturally, according to their plans, he, also, must be lifted aside, and with hired assassins, to attempt his life, efforts, by means of clever libels to destroy his character, kidnappings, and other such gentle diversions, he does not find life devoid of interest. The story goes with a rush from first page to last, and the identity of the hero is concealed effectively until the end. Of course there is a love story, and a good one, too, for otherwise why introduce a beautiful girl with quick wits and intelligent coolness to be always on hand at the psychological moment? In a way, the theme of "The Port of Missing Men" recalls Mrs. Atherton's "Rulers of Kings." Mrs. Atherton invented an archduchess who, to say the least, was, according to European royal standards, a decidedly unmanageable miss, and most disrespectful to her imperial parent. Her phenomenal young American kicked Austria out of his path as not worth bothering with, and carried off the mythical princess to be an American million-aress forevermore. Mr. Nicholson's Armitage adopts America for his home, resigns any claim he might have asserted to another fatherland, and marries Shirley Claiborne without fuss and feathers. As far as a comparison may be instituted, one book is a dime novel in cloth binding and the other a very good specimen of the pseudo-historical romance. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

"The Dogs of War"

Walter Emmanuel has done something really good with his "Dogs of War." It is an admirable burlesque on some of the biographies of the day, wherein Nobodys are exalted, the abject chronicles shining feebly by reflected light. The biographer is a true hero-worshipper, who sees only the best in every action and opinion of his "Captain," and who is ready to distort facts or suppress evidence in order to prove his point. "The Dogs of War" was the name of the club founded by this most admirable Captain, and the descriptions of its functions, and of the various distinguished members is most amusing. There is one unfortunate animal whose sufferings are too realistic not to have been drawn from life. The unlucky beast was given to a family of six boys, who proceeded to apportion to themselves definite parts of his anatomy and to run their boundary lines in indelible ink. No sooner had they laid off their territory than they began the boyish trick of swapping, a few inches of a hind leg for a white alley, and an ear for a bit of candy, of course, nearly flaying the object of their desires in their efforts to erase the former metes and bounds. The dog-view of the human race, of the toy species, of daschunds, cats, horses and other canine matters is most amusing. There is a laugh in "The Dogs of War" for young and old, and just enough of seriousness under it all to make the book something more than a passing joke. It is really more worthy of serious attention than half the volumes foisted upon children in sober earnestness, as choice "nature study" books. At all events, the preternatural gravity with which a dog is often caught observing his human companions will make Mr. Emmanuel's work appreciated by all dog-lovers. Illustrations, which are numerous, both full page in colors and smaller pictures interspersed in the letter press, are by Cecil Alden. The book is one of the many handsome recent publications of Charles Scribner's Sons.

A Bridge Guide

Treatises on the subject of Bridge multiply as Bible commentaries did in the days of the Puritans, and today it is a far greater sin not to know the game than it is to be ignorant of the Bible. "The Bridge Blue Book," compiled by Paul F. Mottelay, would seem to leave nothing for any one else to add. It includes not only the history and bibliography of the game, but the cited opinions of the leading authorities on every point. There are tables of probabilities, rules for every possible emergency, laws for the common game, the American game, and a dozen variations, and a glossary and index. The interested reader is taken by the hand and led step by step, not only through the game, but through all the theories of the master players and the scientific reasons for their conclusions. It would be rank heresy to hint that there is any one who does not play, or care to learn bridge, so that it may be safely said that this is a book for everyone, from teacher to beginner. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

A Suggestion

The present anomalous situation of this city is perhaps without a parallel in the history of this or any other country. We find ourselves governed by a legislative body composed of men who have confessed their infidelity to the trust which they were sworn to execute and who have no plea to offer in palliation of the crimes for which immurement in the penitentiary is the penalty. No explanation has been given of the failure of the District Attorney to take the prescribed steps for ousting malefactors of this stripe from office, but the reason of his passivity is obvious; if vacancies were created they would be filled by the Mayor who is himself under indictment, and who, until convicted, cannot be restrained from the exercise of the functions of his office. Meanwhile the unimprisoned criminals of the Board of Supervisors, intent upon cultivating the forbearance of the District Attorney, will perform their functions in a manner satisfactory to him. We feel moved to challenge this astounding situation. Of course we have the disposition to believe that the District Attorney and his associates are operating with the purest and most benevolent intentions; nor would we venture the suggestion that any temptation would divert them from the path of strict uncompromising rectitude for a moment or by so much as a hair's breadth. Perish the thought that these honorable gentlemen would do more or less than their duty! We are in no agony of apprehension on that score, but we feel that it is about time to dissipate with the clear light of a rational and earnest civic patriotism the umbrage of graft in which this pusillanimous community has so long sluggishly reposed. Having fallen into muck there is really no imperative reason for wallowing in it as though indulging a congenital inclination, or submitting to having it rubbed in as though we were under the delusion that it possessed tonic virtues. To tolerate with stupid complaisance this band of shameless crooks and submit tamely to the exercise by them of the sacred functions of government is to confess a state of morals hardly less repulsive than that of the unconscionable rascals who have not the decency to release their grip on the city's pay-roll. We are of the opinion that there are many intelligent onlookers who are convinced that it behooves the civic spirit of this city—if any still lives—to assert itself. We think it quite probable that Mayor Schmitz may be found open to suggestion at this time; and that he would not be averse to serving as a medium for the substitution of men of recognized probity for those whose proper sphere of action at present is the jute mill. Mayor Schmitz, it is true, has not confessed; neither has he been convicted of a crime. Indeed he resents, after the manner of a proud, high-spirited, supersensitive nature, the painful and injurious accusations that have been made against him, but we have an inkling that he is not impervious to reason. He now realizes that his associates are notoriously bad. Even his constituents of the labor council have taken the pains to affirm that much, and therefore he need not fear that it is organized capital that is persuaded of the advisability of a change in his official menage. He has lost his grip on the imagination of the plain people and no longer commands the loyal vociferation of the erstwhile unenlightened who were united by the sympathetic bond of common ignorance. None now so credulous as to do him reverence save an occasional president of a public service corporation. In this unhappy state he should be eager to conciliate his townsmen in some slight degree, and he would, we believe, if politely approached by a sufficiently safe and sane committee; a committee comprising, for example, the Governor of the State, one or two representatives of the Labor Council, one or two representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, and a leading divine or two. To get a decent Board of Supervisors it should be merely necessary for the right person to take the initiative. The Mayor appointed a good Committee of Safety. Why shouldn't he again listen to suggestion? We are standing tiptoe on the shore waiting for the coming leader, some fine melodramatic figure of a man with a genius for taking hold and doing things. The Governor of the State ought to be able to fill the bill and in no weak brotherly fashion. Possessed as he is of the pardoning power he should carry considerable weight.

The Moral Prospect

With the Grand Jury in full cry after the rascals who have debauched the administration of this city many are wondering whether reform has in all sober reality come here to stay. Is San Francisco, so long used to dishonesty in public office and selfishness in business circles, actually going to have a new spirit of integrity infused into her municipal officers and some feelings of altruistic endeavor grafted on the narrow commercial ideas of her moneyed men? To most serious students of local conditions it seems altogether too much to expect. And yet the analogy of other cities which have passed through the moral spasm which we are now in the throes of encourages the belief that after our blood is thoroughly purged we shall enjoy sound health for many years to come. St. Louis is now honestly administered; so are Minneapolis and Cleveland. Philadelphia was getting along nicely until she neglected her medicine and suffered a dangerous relapse. If from similar premises similar conclusions may be drawn it would seem that San Francisco's future is radiant with the jewels of good government and high public spirit. But notwithstanding the logical inference the disease in our blood makes us sceptical. We are not like other cities; wickedness flowers here with something of the exuberance popularly connected with Southern countries; it is remarkably easier to be evil than to be good in San Francisco, a fact which Easterners who come here with nervous regard for the conventions and exalted notions of the proprieties as practiced on the Atlantic seaboard are quick to note and which they never entirely understand. Strange evils, exotic habits and perverted tastes have taken root in the soil and though the earthquake and fire swept away the local habitation of most that was unholy in our midst vice is once more efflorescent. All sorts of corruption in all walks of life have been associated with this city (in the minds of those who really know it) for several decades. If we are to have a Spotless Town, as the graft investigators assure us, is it to be a Spotless Town in all honest thoroughness or is the filth of public life to be swept away while all the rest of the dirt remains untouched? And is the besom of reform to continue active so that no more grime may gather about our municipal offices?

Our Fundamental Defect

Buoyed up on the rising tide of civic regeneration our municipal housecleaners are willing to promise anything and everything, but it is the part of wisdom not to expect too much while at the same time striving for the very greatest measure of reform that is within the bounds of possibility. It may be that San Francisco, cleansed of the corruption that has been eating out her vitals, will go and sin no more, but she can never accomplish her salvation by mere passive acquiescence in the punishment of the grafters. It must be an active campaign and it is a gigantic task which will demand all that our public spirited citizens have of fortitude and delicacy and perseverance. Already, with the war on the corruptionists but half begun, there is serious thought being given to constructive measures and this is a very encouraging sign. It must be remembered, though, that ours is a sanguine temperament, inclined to plan with enthusiasm and then turn in distaste of the necessary sacrifices from the hard labor of accomplishment. The fate of the Burnham plans for the improvement and adornment of the city is illustrative of this unhappy weakness. Conceived on splendid lines the scheme of the Chicago architect appealed to our artistic appreciation of the beautiful as much as it recommended itself to the commercial perspicacity of our more liberal merchants and business men, yet when the catastrophe of last year gave an undreamed-of opportunity for carrying it into effect, petty considerations blocked every effort and left it where it seems destined to remain forever—on paper. It may seem unnecessarily pessimistic to suggest a similar outcome for the Grand Jury plans for the regeneration of the city, but unless we realize our fundamental defect it will be impossible to guard against it.

Why Men Take Bribes

Lincoln Steffens has told how, after the subject of municipal graft had strongly stirred his mind, he was confronted with the question—"Why is it wrong to steal?"—and how all his studies have been directed to the solution of this apparently simple problem. Consideration of the confessions of the boodling supervisors enables one to appreciate the difficulty of returning an adequate answer to the Steffens interrogatory, yet must it be answered to the satisfaction of the San Francisco mind before any permanent reform is possible. The student of ethics can tell Steffens and San Francisco glibly enough that it is wrong to steal because theft violates property rights and runs counter to that natural perception of elementary right and wrong which is implanted in the heart of every man, but the complicated conditions of modern civilization cannot be met by any ethical formula. There is also implanted in the heart of every man a sentiment of gratitude toward those to whom he is obligated for favors and, paradoxical as it may seem, stealing in public office most frequently grows out of this very commendable sentiment. Anyone who has read the remarkable confession of Supervisor Lonergan will admit that here was a man as far removed, when he took office, from the bandit type as it is possible for man to be. He did not cold-bloodedly calculate the opportunities of robbing corporations which needed his vote; his stealing was a gradual growth that sprang from his relations to the man who had put him into office and flourished only when opportunity had thoroughly demoralized him. Lonergan stole because Ruef wanted his services, demanded his services in return for the office which he had conferred on Lonergan and because, when he had satisfied his sense of the obligation he owed to Ruef, it seemed foolish to refuse the bribe which was merely incidental to the corrupt bargain. The fundamental viciousness of the political system which allows room for a boss—and that is the American system—lies in the fact that too often the puppets elected to office cannot realize their obligation to the electors while they deeply feel their obligations to the boss. What had San Francisco done for Lonergan that he should do anything for San Francisco? Would San Francisco ever have dreamed of taking an ignorant old man off the seat of a bakery wagon and placing him in the board of supervisors if the city had its own way in politics and was not subject to the domination of a rapacious and vicious boss? So the principle of ethics which says that stealing is a violation of the natural law cannot be expected to sway Lonergan and others of his kind with anything like the force of his primitive sense of gratitude which is a quality that even animals possess. To the ignorant supervisors it seemed incumbent to vote for or against certain measures according to the wishes of their political creator; the bribe was a bonus, a perquisite, one of the pleasant incidentals of office-holding. If it were not grotesquely absurd to credit such men as those whom Ruef made supervisors out of with any such quality as honor or any but the most animal-like notion of fidelity, one might apply to them Tennyson's "His honor rooted in dishonor stood and faith unfaithful made him falsely true."

Bossism the Root Evil

This explanation does not exculpate the Lonergans by any means, but it throws the onus of criminal responsibility where it more particularly belongs—on Ruef in this case. As long as American politics is ruled by bosses the terrible conditions which have developed in this city must continue. Only in Utopia will the political boss be actuated by any but predatory considerations. He rules to rob or to further an ambition which aims at, let us say, the United States Senate. Experience has shown that corruption for all his puppets lies along either road. He must be abolished before decency can prevail in public office and before there can be any general realization of the fact that it is wrong to steal. When supervisors and other public servants have ceased to be the accidents of boss rule and are really chosen by the electors their responsibility will be direct and their sense of obligation will not be distorted to cover criminality as at present. Here is the problem that faces San Francisco's reformers, as difficult a one to cope with as the complicated conditions of civilization offers. Already there is talk of a citizens' committee, a sort of people's lobby, to camp on the trail of public officers and prevent them from swerving from the straight path of duty. Provided this system does not substitute a number of petty bosses for one it may be meritorious. The direct primary is another proposed remedy. Distrust of panaceas is so deep-seated in serious thinkers that assent cannot be given to any system while it remains in the stage where it dazzles with the splendor of glittering generalities. There is hard work ahead for all the serious minds in our midst and if they will lend to the work of reconstruction the sincerity and enthusiasm so far displayed by the prosecutors, pessimism will be discounted and the prophets of evil will be thoroughly discredited by San Francisco's future.

Child Labor

Mr. N. O. Nelson, a St. Louis multimillionaire, has been so impressed by the evils of child labor that he has inaugurated a practical scheme for dispensing with the services of the liliputian horde. He has undertaken to pay to child laborers of fourteen years and under one-half the sum that they have earned in factories and elsewhere, the women's clubs to pay the other half, but until the clubs have perfected some scheme for carrying out their part of the plan, Mr. Nelson is assuming the whole burden. One result of this philanthropy is the investigation into the necessities of families which have been putting the younger members into the labor mart, and the discovery that not more than one-third are actually in such destitute circumstances that the earnings of the children are necessary. There is, in truth, as much of a popular fad about the outcry as there is real need for interference. There is no doubt that in certain districts, such as the coal mining region, boys have their childhood days cut cruelly short to be put at labor which not only is miserably paid but which offers no outlook but hopeless drudgery. Children in the south are sent into the cotton mills where they labor by the side of their mothers, while the fathers loaf in luxurious laziness; and the little ones hard driven to find some excuse for the paternal shiftlessness, confess that father must stay at home in order that there be a messenger to "fetch we-all's dinner." Greed is as much of the employment of children as need, not the greed of employers, but the greed of fathers and mothers who find it easier to drive the babies forth than to exert themselves, or who have intently fixed before them a dream of independence which they can realize by utilizing every ounce of strength and hoarding every penny. There are fully a score of wealthy families in New York today who landed within the generation, without a penny in their pockets, a word of English on their tongues or an idea in their minds of anything saving the importance of accumulating pelf. They have lived in crowded quarters, literally starved both bodies and minds, and worked in relays, one section asleep while the other sweated, gradually accumulating money and enlarging their business until, from earning a few cents a day sewing buttons on finished garments they have blossomed out into importers and wholesale dealers. The children in families of this type work cheerfully, having always the future before them, but there is no let-up nor lightening until the goal is reached. The public has an exaggerated idea of the desperate misery which compels parents to sacrifice their children. As a matter of fact the foreign immigrant, having worked early and long himself, sees no reason why his child should do otherwise, and being accustomed to narrow streets, restricted housing, and inconveniences in his environment, he does not take the view of the situation which is peculiar to the average American. But there are many American parents whose views are also productive of deplorable consequences to their children. They are guilty of a species of cruelty in rendering their offspring unfit through overindulgence of habits of laziness. Fifteen is none too young for apprenticeship to any manual trade. Habits of application and industry are of more value than the mere wage, and long-continued attendance at school under our present system can have no other effect than that of confirming the youth of both sexes in the impression that the one thing they have to think of is amusement, distraction, and the dropping of every occupation as soon as it ceases to be play. It is full time that as a nation we began to take stock of ourselves. However agreeable it would be, there is nothing gained by turning our backs on the truth, which is that the lot of the average man is not to be that of millionaire idler but worker in the ranks, and the sooner the boy is trained to drop into his place the better chance there is for his rising out of it. Comparatively few of our leading men of affairs were born to wealth, and still fewer of those who have inherited ease have not come of hard-working parentage.

Sonnet

Written in Holy Week at Genoa

By Oscar Wilde

I wandered through Scoglietto's far retreat,
 The oranges on each o'erhanging spray
 Burned as bright lamps of gold to shame the day;
 Some startled bird with fluttering wings and fleet
 Made snow of all the blossoms, at my feet
 Like silver moons the pale narcissi lay
 And the curved waves that streaked the great green bay
 Laughed i' the sun, and life seemed very sweet.
 Outside the young boy-priest passed singing clear,
 "Jesus the Son of Mary has been slain.
 O come and fill his sepulchre with flowers."
 Ah, God! Ah, God! those dear Hellenic hours
 Had drowned all memory of thy bitter pain,
 The Cross, the Crown, the Soldiers, and the Spear.

Perspective Impressions

It was probably Burns that persuaded Ruef to go to Trocadero.

The Supervisors have concluded that it is expedient to be coerced into goodness when it is dangerous to be bribed into badness.

President Butler of Columbia is in favor of an aristocracy of intellect. That is what Ruef joined when he graduated from Berkeley.

A professor across the bay says that the study of mythology makes people superstitious. Are they not born that way and do they not remain that way in despite of mythology or any other study?

An awful lot of tainted money will soon be in circulation in the legal profession.

If Ruef has not confessed he is at least open to negotiations. This state of mind is temperamental with Abe.

"That grand old man Samuel Gompers," says Mr. Livernash, "had no knowledge" of the motives of McCarthy when the latter was persuading him to knock Gillett. But the grand old man doesn't need knowledge. And even when he has it he doesn't use it unless it serves his purpose. He had knowledge of Schmitz, and yet he gave him a certificate of character and slandered the men who are trying to redeem San Francisco.

Ruef's Revenge

By Theodore Bonnet

If only I were a moralist, like Mark Twain or George Bernard Shaw, how I could improve the occasion of Abe Ruef's downfall. Shaw and Twain are my preferred types because nowadays the moralist who is not a humorist wastes his eloquence on empty pews. In this frivolous age solemnity is confounded with insincerity; and stern truths are palatable only when presented in fantastic garb.

The beneficent catastrophe of which Abe Ruef is the central figure is rich in lessons for the young person who has not yet come to realize that man walketh in a shadow and disquieteth himself in vain. It is from such events that young men are enabled to get by observation alone something of the precious experience of life without being subjected to personal sacrifices either of time or money. And though it is unquestionably a perversion of diligence to formulate standards of behaviour for others, I am loath to neglect the opportunity that is afforded of pointing out the fatal passion that motivated the transaction which brought the pernicious activities of the unspeakable boss to a close; not that I would warn other criminals against the folly of indulging this passion, but that I would call attention to the hazards which it entails. That fatal passion is revenge. It is a passion to which the authors of high moral platitudes and copy-book maxims have given scant attention. They have been criminally indifferent to the insidious influence of the familiar aphorism which imputes nothing but sweetness to revenge, and as a consequence men indulge their thirst for reprisal with something of the enthusiasm with which they cancel the most legitimate obligations. Nobody ever tells us that revengefulness is one of the ugliest traits that character can have, or that aside from its vulgarity it should be abominated for its inexpediency and its ineptness. Quite often it is the one imperfection that renders a man despicable, and yet those by whom the man is despised are seldom conscious of the reason of their aversion. They speak of him as narrow-minded and mean, but they do not perceive that it is his inexorable lust of reprisal in the ordinary affairs of life that gives him the repulsive aspect. The fact is that revenge is a quality common to pirates and pickpockets and characteristic of people who are always taut and tingling with vanity.

There are men that actually boast of their vindictiveness. There are men proud of their unrelenting nature who view with scorn the forgiving temper of others. It is a good thing for men of this perverse character to have their minds thrown off the track and jolted into new ethical viewpoints. An enviable privilege this, and to those upon whom it has had the right effect life always seems more worth the living.

Unfortunately all men are not to be converted by appeals to their spiritual nature. Many are to be persuaded only by proof of expediency. The nature of the average vindictive man is not to be softened by being advised that it is nobler to grant a pardon than to condemn. He is apt to scoff if told that Juvenal affirmed revenge to be the pleasure of a little, weak and narrow mind; but point out to him with sufficient eloquence that the main objection to it is that it complicates one's vital affairs and if he is a man of discretion he will pause and reflect. And this is a line of argument that may be pursued with considerable force, for there is much in contemporary experience that favors the belief that revenge is most unprofitable.

If a man is intent upon preventing his soul's palate from being jaded let him give rein to that passion, and when he has had his revenges then will his aggravations begin. In time he will come to the conclusion that howsoever great the satisfaction one gets from repaying an enemy in his own coin it is in reality a brummagem bliss by no means comparable with the calm contentment of those whose prejudices die an early death. For to be able to wreak revenge ruthlessly and indiscriminately one must so govern his life as to keep it from undue exposure. One cannot afford to run for office or break into society if one has been bitter and unrelenting toward his fellow men and never inclined, when denied some favor, to reflect that perhaps there were other interests that demanded consideration.

Revenge is in reality a luxury which none but an occasional genius can afford to indulge. Whistler, who prided himself on his resourcefulness in the "gentle art of making enemies," reveled in the exploits of his own malice, but even he, it is said, in jolting an enemy tormented himself. Usually when a man pushes his personality so far to the front of aggressive schemes of revenge as Whistler and Abe Ruef did it is the most natural thing in the world for him to encounter something that will hurt. Abe Ruef reduced his philosophy to the single postulate: revenge is sweet. He was a glutton for revenge and despite his virtuosity as a grafter he was crushed by the recoil of that primitive passion. Vindictiveness was one of the salient features of the ugly personality that so long dominated the affairs of this city. Never did Ruef stop to conciliate an enemy. "I'll drive him out of town," was the threat with which he sought to strike terror to the hearts of his opponents. Every politician that refused to bend to his yoke, every newspaper man that pronounced him a grafter was threatened with expulsion from the city. He gave vent to his vindictive spirit on public platforms from which he hurled defiance, threats and slanders at his critics. Never did he lose an opportunity to inflict injury on even the meanest and humblest of his enemies. It was to satisfy the vindictive spirit of Ruef that Frank Maestretti was removed from office. That episode was the fatal boomerang of revenge that hurtled home and struck the enraged boss down. Supreme and climactic act of folly was that expression of the spirit of vindictiveness. Revenge was sweet to the esurient boss, but how bitter the drégs that he had to swallow! By that revenge was retribution sired.

It was a sad caprice that impelled Ruef to demand the removal of Maestretti. Maestretti was Schmitz's devoted friend and could be depended upon to support the Mayor's political machine, but Ruef was not satisfied with that sort of allegiance. Maestretti was of too independent a nature to suit him. So despite the fact that he had enjoyed the confidence of both Schmitz and Ruef and knew of the corruption of both of them he lost his job. The strongly entrenched boss had no fear of the consequences. Within forty-eight hours after his retirement from public office Maestretti was persuaded to have a confidential chat with Fremont Older, editor of the Bulletin. That meeting was the beginning of the end. Mr. Older inspired the so-called conspiracy against the graft machine and organized the forces that wrecked Ruef's temple of graft. But it was Maestretti that pointed the way.

The Dreadful Soul of Woman

By Maud Churton

"You have not known
The dreadful soul of woman, who one day
Forgets the old and takes the new to heart,
Forgets what man remembers, and therewith Forgets the man."

—D. G. Rossetti.

"There, darling," she said, lifting his pillow higher, "is that better?"

The sick man threw a lean arm above his head.

"I wish the cursed examination were over," he moaned; "I wish to God I'd never come to this place."

"You would never have got well at home, dear," she replied, in the weary voice of one who has said it all many times before. "Here you will have the best nursing possible * * * and I will come every day * * * and you couldn't have a cleverer doctor than John Menzies."

"I don't believe Menzies understands my case," he sighed, fretfully. "And the prospect of that frightful operation * * * this suspense * * * Oh, why don't those fellows come quickly?"

Footsteps were heard in the passage outside.

"The doctors are coming," said the woman, with a faint quickening of her voice. She was holding her breath to listen. A curious excitement came into her eyes. The blood had left her cheeks. She was very pale, and her lips showed for an instant the white marks where her teeth had just bitten.

"This way, sir," said a patient voice outside.

The door opened, and the Sister entered, followed by two men. She was a pale, sweet-faced woman with sympathetic blue eyes and a tender mouth. She looked pityingly at the wife standing by the sick man's bed.

John Menzies was shaking hands. The other doctor stood in the background.

"We have great hopes, madam, great hopes," said the famous surgeon, and the woman realized that the lie was for the dying man's sake.

"I had better go downstairs, Sister?" she asked.

"If you will, please."

Dr. Hallam held the door open for her. He was a powerfully built man, with a rugged face and a cleft chin—strong and brutal. His deep eyes seared her face as she passed. She had neither looked at nor spoken to him.

Downstairs in the waiting-room, she stood by the window, staring out into the quiet London street, with unseeing eyes of despair; and then she began to pace to and fro—her bosom heaving, her hands clasped in front of her.

She was a handsome woman of about thirty years old—tall and very white-skinned, with black hair dressed loosely and drawn back from her face, and large grey eyes full of varying emotions. Her mouth was red and full, her chin was firm, her figure possessed beautiful curves. She was a woman to be ardently loved, a woman who could love back again with soul and heart and brain.

"Twelve years!" she said, drawing her breath in a sharp sob. "Twelve years my lover and husband! And he is dying * * * and I? He will only be with me a little longer, and yet I * * *"

She heard the voice of Dr. Hallam on the stairs and instantly the color rushed to her cheeks. Eagerly she scanned her face in the over-mantel mirror, and with trembling hands smoothed her hair. When the doctors entered, they found her calm and self-possessed—a proud and splendid presence.

As before, Menzies came into the room first. The great man was short and insignificant looking. His blue eyes were cold and impenetrable, his mouth hard, his whole expression of stone. In every way he was the opposite of Dr. Hallam.

The woman interrupted his guarded speech impatiently. "I want the truth!" she cried, with passion.

"I have told you all I know," he said, coldly. Years of systematic self-repression had taught him to detest any expression of emotion. With something of relief he turned to the Sister, who had been talking to Hallam.

"On Thursday," the woman heard him say. "Either at ten or two, but will let you know for certain. Mr. Burgess will be the anaesthetist. I shall operate myself, of course, and Dr. Hallam will also be present. Nurse Canning and yourself, please; I think that is all."

"Don't go, Sister!" she said, and there was a note of fear in her voice which brought a gleam into the eyes of Hallam.

"I will come back in a moment," returned the Sister.

The door closed. Dr. Hallam and the woman were left alone. For the first time she looked him full in the face.

"What do you think of my husband?" she asked, quietly.

"He is very ill."

"You—think he will—die?"

The doctor looked very grave.

"In our profession," he said, "we avoid—that word, but to you—"

"I understand," she returned, with dignity.

"Thanks. Do not let me keep you."

He did not move. There was a silence, during which she listened to the loud beating of her heart.

Japanese Poetry

By G. J.

Japan is the land of poetry. It is read by everyone, composed by almost everyone, felt by everyone; it is as universal as the birds and the flowers. Everywhere it is heard by the ear and seen by the eye. It is heard in the fields where the laborers chant at their work continually, it is heard in the streets where the various sellers of flowers and fruit and pipes and toys and sweetstuffs sing their wares, where the children sing their games, where the mendicant friars sing their appeal for alms, and where, after dark, even the blind masseuses sing to advertise their calling.

There is singing on the calm lake where the boatman is rowing, and in the temple courts where folks are at their prayers. Wandering minstrels go from house to house, singing long poetic tales and histories, accompanying their voices with the samisen, whilst all the members of the household, from the master to the kitchen maid, are congregated to listen. I remember assisting at a like seance, which lasted literally for hours, the audience being engrossed all the time and weeping unanimously at the affecting parts. As for me, the music was oriental, and the story was not translated for me till afterwards. It was a pathetic enough lament of blind lovers, who sought each other, many years, all over the countryside.

As for visible poetry, it is to be seen at certain social gatherings, where it is written by the guests upon gilded paper, in the beautiful character of the Far East, and hung upon the branches of flowering trees, there to flutter in the wind. It is seen at religious ceremonies, where poems are attached to bamboo rods, and set all along the roadside. It contributes, in a great measure, to the interior decoration of houses where poetic texts are hung upon the walls, or carved upon the woodwork, or painted upon the doors. It is found upon fans and drinking cups, pipes and swords, upon all manner of household utensils. It ornaments shop signs and advertisements, and the blue towel which the coolie winds about his head.

From the eighth century downwards poetical expression has been popular, nay, something like universal in Japan. Hitomaro and Akahito are the two most celebrated names in the history of early Japanese song; their works with those of other poets are preserved in an anthology called "The Collection of the Myriad Leaves," first compiled in the eighth century. Other collections are "Songs Ancient and Modern," and "The Anthology of the One-and-Twenty Reigns." Until the revolution of 1868 the ability to write polished verse was one of the almost necessary accomplishments of a Japanese gentleman, and to the present day there exist many professional teachers of the art. Here is a program of themes for poetical treatment made out by a lady instructor who has a large circle of pupils.

December, January, July, and August are vacation months. The themes set for the other months, and sent round to the would-be poets, printed on slips of paper, are as follows:—

February.—The willow tree in early spring. The cock at dawn.

March.—A walk in spring. Mutual love.

April.—Blossoms fallen into a pond.

May.—At anchor on a summer voyage. A comparison of love to water.

June.—Cormorant fishing at eve. Clouds on the distant hills.

September.—Insects by moonlight.

October.—Birds in the late autumn. Love in the rain.

November.—Praise of the last Chrysanthemum. Wishing a friend the thousand years life of the Pine tree.

The themes are in most cases appropriate, even to Western minds, to the seasons for which they are chosen, but to those who are acquainted with Japanese literary conventionalities they are more appropriate still, for, according to these laws, the moon belongs to Autumn more than to any other season, and to September more than to any other month.

Year by year, there is held in Japan a great poetic competition or tournament. The Mikado and his Empress, together with many ladies and nobles of the Court, compose odes upon a given theme. Also all the nation is invited to write poems, and often many thousand efforts are sent in to be judged upon such subjects as, for instance, "Praying for the Dynasty at a Shinto Temple," "The Longevity of the Green Bamboo," "Pine Trees Buried in the Snow," etc., the aim of the competitors being, in general, skilfully to introduce amongst their poetic images some patriotic sentiment, or graceful compliment to the reigning house.

There is a very curious aspect of Japanese poetry, an aspect which, as far as I know, belongs to the Japanese alone amongst the poetries of Nations. This may be called its moral aspect. From very ancient times it has been the custom in Japan to compose poems as a moral duty as well as an art. The old teaching contended that it was better to soothe the feelings by writing a poem than to proceed to rash revenge or unpremeditated violence. In times of sorrow or bereavement forbear to wear out mind and body in useless plaints. Rather occupy the emotions and stimulate the imagination by writing a poem on grief, or pain, or death, or immortality. Or, if you can turn aside from your personal sorrow to contemplate the joyousness, the invariable beauty of Nature, so much the better; be comforted thereby, and dedicate a poem.

Resurgam

By Mabel Porter Pitts

Three midnight skies have seen the stars
 Drag languid on their way
 And twice the listless sun has risen
 To wake unwilling day;
 No leaf within the grove has stirred
 Since that last night of prayer,
 No flow'r but that is furled and still
 Since Judas entered there;
 But, lo, from out the empty space
 That rings the dormant sod
 A mystic, voiceless word has spoke
 The wonder-love of God,
 And all the world turns roseate hued
 That late lay pale and wan
 As bursts across the waiting east
 Christ's resurrection dawn.

The Spectator

A Dearth of Spring Poetry

What, I wish to know, has become of the Spring poet? He has utterly neglected me this year. I have received nothing in the shape of seasonable verse save the following lines, entitled "Easter Grace," which the author evidently doesn't think any more of than I do, for he discreetly asks that he be not exposed:

Lent is spent and we are able
 To sit once more at a groaning table.
 Loud today we sing Hosanna!
 Now with Maud and Mariana Mamma, Papa, and the last
 My hungry self, we break our fast.
 As we discuss each dainty dish
 Lets not forget our days of fish,
 And as we eat and as we drink,
 Upon our Lenten lessons think,
 And render thanks for this our food
 To God the Giver of all good.

These lines are of mediocre quality and I publish them only to indicate the barrenness of the local muse. Is our tribe of sonnetteers dying out? Is there none to hail the dearest season of the year? This is the season of moods, of introspection and retrospection, the season that has inspired bards in all ages, and yet nary a one in this neck of the woods has seen fit to pipe his lay and come through with a lyric gem and lift up our thoughts on the swell of emotion.

Mere Idle Speculation

This dearth of Spring poems is a notable phenomenon. It is unquestionably of subtle significance. I suspect that there is some connection between the muteness of the poetic muse and the graft investigation. I am loath to believe that our poets have become disheartened by neglect or that they have capitulated to the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune. Much derision has been heaped upon poets in recent years by the worshipers of Mammon, the apotheosizers of Success, who regard as fools all men that write poetry instead of devoting their talents to something more lucrative. But the true poet has always scorned the benighted of that calibre. If a man is a poet he should be one without evasion and be proud of his inability to live luxuriously by his poetry; for poetry that pays well in this materialistic age must be bad poetry. And to the everlasting credit of Californian poetry, be it said, it does not pay. Nor does this fact in the slightest degree concern our poets. Yet not one of them has come forward to open the Spring season. And this is the season in which Venus revels! Sweet suns the green hills are shinning o'er, the buds are bursting from the spray, feathered warblers blithely woo in every tree and even old Ocean roars in wayward mirth, but the poet is sulking somewhere. Perhaps he is mourning the asparagus crop.

A Danger Signal

Gravely and with the deepest concern for their own welfare I would adjure the gentlemen behind the prosecution of the city's debauchers to repress their predilection for inordinate mutual admiration on the housetops. I would warn them against the folly of so hazardous an occupation. No man howsoever great his achievements can afford to mount the lofty breathless peak of self-felicitation and there with inflated chest point with ineffable pride to his well-earned nimbus. I would not disparage the splendid achievements of the attorneys for the prosecution. On the contrary I expedite my grateful acknowledgment of the tact and ingenuity by which they have consummated the city's redemption. But they have not yet finished their task. They have yet to meet the enemy in court. Meanwhile there is danger of the melody of self-felicitation, now being so industriously churned in the chins of the indefatigables, becoming as stale and nerve-racking as the Verdi tunes that suffer incessant diffusion through the medium of the vulgar barrel organ. It would be painful to see gentlemen who have won so much glory in a noble cause successfully made the objects of plausible ridicule. I hope to see them all pedestaled by a grateful populace, but I am sure that the psychological moment has not arrived for titillating the people's honest eagerness for the reward of merit. Until the arrival of that moment the heroes of the hour must be taken seriously. They should guard against being overwhelmed with a torrent of terrible levities.

A Bit of Brummagem

To make perfectly clear what I am driving at I will call attention to the prose madrigals in which the reporters have been singing the praises of Mr. Heney's bright young partner, Mr. Charles W. Cobb, late of San Jose. Why Mr. Cobb should be dragged into the limelight at this time it is impossible for me to conjecture. No doubt he has earned rapturous panegyrics, but I submit that the one which appeared in the Examiner some days ago was not felicitously conceived. We were told that though Mr. Cobb "has not pressed himself forward in the work of the prosecution, he is recognized by the lawyers as one of the ablest practitioners at the bar, and all those engaged in the prosecution lean upon him for advice and for any work that requires painstaking care and tireless research." All of which may be very true, but how perfunctory the style of it! Especially does it seem perfunctory when the pretext is considered. The pretext is revealed in the headlines:

Heney's Partner Drew Indictments.

Recognized Ability of Charles W. Cobb, Who Aided in the Prosecution of the Boss.

If we stop to reflect that the essential qualities for drawing an indictment are clerical ability and a knowledge of the fundamental principles of criminal law, which is the simplest branch of the law, how inartistic and implausible does the glowing panegyric appear!

Frank Admiration

Also let us consider the mutual admiration of Francis J. Heney and William H. Langdon which is finding almost daily expression in rapid-fire exchanges of testimonials. One might suspect from the character of them that each was afraid to offend the other by the accumulation of more than his share of the credit. But Mr. Langdon feeling that he can afford to be generous scatters his compliments with a prodigal hand. "The ablest man in my judgment at the California bar," says Mr. Langdon, "is Hiram Johnson. He has entered into this investigation and this prosecution heart and soul," etc., etc. After doing what he conceives to be his duty toward Mr. Johnson, the District Attorney takes up Mr. Heney's partner, the brilliant Mr. Cobb, but dismisses him with what seems to me scant praise. "He is a close student and an able statistician," says the District Attorney; which surely isn't saying much for the man who drew the indictments. Indeed it is vague and indefinite and might be interpreted as a knock with the same facility with which it is construed as a boost. Contrast it with the inspiring encomiums with which the District Attorney garlands the manly brow of his manager in the late gubernatorial campaign, the Hon. J. J. Dwyer, and then the equivocation that characterizes the reference to the brilliant Mr. Cobb becomes affecting. "The whole plan of our campaign," says Mr. Langdon, "has been backed by the aggressive honesty and uncompromising vigor of California's reform leader, Joseph J. Dwyer." Reads somewhat like a political speech but Mr. Langdon is most felicitous when expressing himself in the terms of politics.

The Real Hero

Now as I have suggested it is too early to be cutting pigeon wings in the limelight. Beware of the flinty Philistine with his little hammer! If Mr. Langdon is to be groomed for the mayoralty, I have no objections. On the contrary I am predisposed to the candidacy of Mr. Langdon and therefore I would have him realize my concept of a hero—one that is clean of self-seeking and that deprecates exaltation. A boom that is prematurely born frequently dies of inanition. When the enthusiasm of the populace shall have subsided then will the iconoclast unbridle himself in an open field. It is well to remember the aftermath of Dewey's feat in Manila Bay. How unfortunate it would be if somebody should comment on the inertness of the District Attorney up to the time that Francis Heney appeared on the scene and the circumstance that instead of trying to abate municipal corruption he gave himself up to the more pleasing diversion of campaigning for the gubernatorial office. There will be ample time for exultation later on when the prosecuting attorneys shall have vindicated their claims to the encomiums that are being so lavishly distributed. Up to date most of the glory belongs to one William Burns, a detective.

Bribe Giving and Bribe Taking

That encomiums will be won I have not the slightest doubt. Strong is my faith in the shrewdness of Heney and the cunning of Burns. And sceptical am I of the stories circulated by the dailies respecting iron-clad agreements by which the boodling officials are assured of immunity. If all the officials are to go scot free then how is the cause of morality to prosper? We are told that the bribe-giver is worse than the receiver of bribes. But is he? By what system of weights and measures is this problem in ethics solved? By what system of ratiocination is the conclusion reached that the official sworn to do his duty, who establishes the market price of privileges and scorns to do anything but a cash business, is less culpable than his customers? It is said that if there were no bribe-givers there would be no bribe-takers. This dictum savors so strongly of the axiomatic that one can scarcely counter without asserting a paradox, but there is no truth like a paradoxical one. But why should it not be maintained that if there were no bribe-takers there would be no bribe-givers? It is decidedly wrong to assume that the bribe-giver goes about dangling temptation in the eyes of the unfortunates upon whose virtue he has malevolent designs. In the case of our unsavory supervisors there was no virtue to begin with. There was not even a delusion in the community at large respecting the character of the men elected to office. Everybody would have been greatly astonished if those men had not started on a hunt for bribes immediately after their election. And now though we know that they fulfilled our expectations we pretend to be frothing with indignation.

A. Leader Wanted

This is not a time to be scrambling for the plums of office. It is the time for the office to seek the man. It is time to drive the money changers out of the temple and to substitute for the worship of pelf the worship of character. On whom shall our salvation depend? In every crisis comes the man to lead his people out of the wilderness to the promised land. Rudolph Spreckels came when we needed a man to disperse the grafters. He would be the man for mayor but he wouldn't take the job, feeling as he does that there should be no taint of self-seeking on his achievement. The personality for this emergency will probably present itself, but there is one thing for us to remember—that we cannot afford to ignore organized labor. There are honest men in that element and they should be given the opportunity to drive the pinhead McCarthys out of power. We should also remember that we had an honest Board of Supervisors some years ago and that some of the men who proved true to their trust are still available.

Bribing Not Imperative

While it is quite true, as is often said, that public service corporations would suffer irreparable damage at the hands of blackmailing officials if they did not yield to the demands for bribes, it is also true that at times hostile officials may be thwarted. If some corporations expended as much brains and energy in devising methods to avoid paying bribes as they do in corrupting legislators, they would discover safe ways of gaining their legitimate ends. The Southern Pacific Company discovered safe ways in many an emergency. Indeed this corporation has done much toward abating the bribing industry; at least, in so far as its own affairs are concerned. I remember some years ago when a hostile city council of Oakland passed an ordinance prohibiting the Southern Pacific Company from putting safety gates on its cars, the corporation did not attempt by the use of money to defeat this legislation. It was asserted that the main purpose of the gates was to prevent the people of Oakland from riding free on the trains and the councilmen thought it an outrage for the company to abate the free-ride snap. Hence the ordinance prohibiting the gates.

Effective Strategy

The Southern Pacific lawyers thought such an ordinance would be unconstitutional, but realized that to beat it in the courts would mean a long, tedious and expensive fight. Prevention was decided upon as the better course, and a member of the legal outfit of the company was put in charge of the work. He found himself confronting a hard problem. Not only were the people aroused over the gate matter, but there was a general fight against the company on in Oakland. George Pardee was Mayor at that time, and was a leader in anti-railroad legislation. With the City Council at his heels he helped tear up a railway ticket office that was on land claimed by the city and bear it to the corporation yards. Trestles in the course of construction were dynamited. Altogether, the Southern Pacific was about the most unpopular institution in Oakland. It was against this state of affairs that the corporation lawyer had to battle. He had but little hope of in any way influencing the council, so instead he procured from the records of the railroad company a complete list of children who had been killed or maimed by jumping onto the unprotected steps of cars while trains were in motion. The ordinance passed, as it was expected it would, and went to Mayor Pardee. But before it came time for the Mayor to sign it he received many visitors. Each of these visitors was a woman, and each had with her a maimed boy, legless or armless. They all had the same request to make, and each gave the same reason. "This," pointing to a maimed child, "is what has happened to my boy through no gates being on the trains," they told him. "God knows I have tried to make him quit it, but you know what boys are. They will jump on the steps after the trains have started. Please don't let that ordinance about putting gates on the trains pass. Do something to save the children, Mayor." They came by the dozen, for the Southern Pacific man had not neglected calling on any of the mothers of crippled children. Women in mourning whose children's lives had been crushed out by the trains called on the Mayor. Schoolteachers pleaded with him. The pressure was more than he could stand, and he vetoed the ordinance.

More Strategy

Then the Council passed an ordinance limiting the speed of trains through the town. There was consternation in the offices of the railroad company. The man who had beaten the gate ordinance was selected to deal with this one. His methods were very simple. He had a speed indicator put in every locomotive, and the engineers were instructed to obey the ordinance to the letter. They did so, and the consequence was that trains were late for the boats, and commuters waxed indignant. The cry went up that the company was running trains even slower than the ordinance required. Thereupon the regulator of Southern Pacific affairs in Oakland secured a private car in which he had an indicator fixed. He also had some mile posts put up along the line of track. He invited the members of the Council, the Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce to take a ride in this car. He had them make a thorough test, with the mile posts as guides, of the speed of the train. They found that the speed was exactly what the ordinance required; also, that the train just missed connecting with the boat. That settled the speed ordinance.

The Labor War In Nevada

Notwithstanding the general dispatches sent by Goldfield correspondents to their local dailies announcing the settlement of the labor troubles, affairs are in such shape in the camp as to cause the gravest disquietude among the conservative element. Despite the boasts of Goldfield boosters the leaders of the Industrial Workers of the World have still a very firm and a very determined grip on a great majority of the members of the miners' union. This grip is held directly and likewise through the Western Federation of Miners, under whose banner the underground men must stand in order to get employment. Every effort imaginable has been made during the past fortnight by the Citizens' Safety Committee to prevail on the miners to throw off all allegiance to the I. W. W. This show of separation has been made up to the point of holding an independent meeting and electing officers, but beyond that point the miners, for reasons best known to the inside, seem loath to go. This hitch blocks all relief of the present situation and until it is broken the mines in Goldfield will certainly remain shut down and all business in the camp will be practically killed. Meanwhile it is obvious that the conservative element is worrying over the next steps of certain elements in the I. W. W. There are those who apprehend that the Cripple Creek outrages may be repeated in the camp. Some believe that if any of the claims should attempt to start up with miners not affiliated with the I. W. W. sticks of dynamite would cut large figures in the ensuing protestations and Silva's would not be the only life sacrificed in the present crisis. Even now "gun" fighters and "special" body guards cut a very potent figure in preserving peace and forbearance in the district.

Doings of the Sharks

The irrepressible mining shark and the speculator are taking every advantage of the present uncertainty. Very important results on the stock market hung on last week's meeting of the miners because on that occasion they were to decide whether or no they should break away from the I. W. W. and return to work in the mines. It happened that on the eventful day the storm destroyed telegraph communication between here and Nevada. Notwithstanding all the guards placed in their way by the union a bustling clique of speculators managed to establish inside connection with their well-paid agents in the meeting. As agreed they were signaled the result and sent it by special automobile messenger through a blinding snow storm to Rhyolite, where the necessary wire was picked up via Los Angeles and San Francisco. What amount of profit this ring cleaned up is hard guessing, but several local brokers, caught short, almost went to the wall. Their losses ran from ten to thirty thousand dollars. Goldfield brokers were hit just as hard by camp agents. On the rose colored reports given out Goldfield issues jumped from twenty to forty per cent. Garbled versions of the settlement sent out by the promoters' news agencies sustained these prices for several days while tens of thousands of shares were being worked off on the public. Gradually tiding of the real situation came to hand and values slipped down. And now the chippers and tail speculators are again playing the waiting game.

The Goldfield Tragedy

A playsmith would have little difficulty in transferring to the stage the protagonists of the tragic drama that had its catastrophe in a Goldfield restaurant last week when Count Constantin Podhorski was killed by "Jack" Hines. Four years ago the Mars sisters, young, beautiful and well educated, went to Nome on the urging of friends, there to better the fortune that the family had lost shortly before. In their new surroundings a great deal was made of them and they had many wooers among rich and influential men. The eldest sister married Albert Fink, a wealthy lawyer and mine owner. The younger sister, scarcely eighteen, married J. C. Hines. In time "Jack" Hines' mining ventures went to pieces. He was given a good outside position by one of the big northern commercial companies where his duties carried him into the distant mining fields on long trips.

The Russian Nobleman

Meanwhile, in Russia, Count Wanlarlarski, a man high in the diplomatic circles, close to the Czar and allied by marriage to several ducal families, had been led into promoting a gigantic scheme in Siberian trade. Chicago and New York capitalists were taken into the venture in order to exploit the Alaskan wing of the enterprise. To look after this end Wanlarlarski selected a protegee of his, Count Constantin Podhorski, and sent him out to Nome. Podhorski was forty years old at the time and had led a vividly romantic life. The son of Princess Radziwell, he was allied to the royal house and to the late Count Podhorski of Poland, whose estates he inherited on the death of his father. He was an officer in the Czar's body guard, the same regiment of which the husband of General Grant's granddaughter belongs. His income was $100,000 a year, but all this melted away in the Russian riots that swept over Poland several years ago. Consequently his venture into trade under the patronage of the powerful Count Wanlarlarski. On reaching Nome the Count was welcomed to the highest social and financial position. He personally invested some $80,000 in mining ventures and was generally regarded as a notable acquisition to the North.

The Love Affair

Then came the meeting with Mrs. Hines socially and the turning point leading to the great tragedy in both their lives. Hines' distant business trips gave opportunity for the misguided infatuation. In a small place like Nome affairs of this character are quickly noted and soon the gossips of the camp were discussing the matter. Under this spur events developed rapidly. Last summer Mrs. Hines left Nome for Seattle alone, ostensibly to visit her mother. She confided to her friends that she had been cooped up too long in the frozen North and her system and spirits demanded a change. Plans were made between husband and wife that she should return in the fall and spend the winter with him in Nome, and so she sailed away. Alone in Nome, Hines found more time to drift about among his old friends and gradually certain rumors reached him. He took an early steamer for Seattle. The Count had already left her. The wife, confronted with the evidence the husband had gathered, confessed everything. Hines declares that he then swore to kill the Count on sight. Where the Count was he did not know. He at once set about planning a new life for himself and wife amid new surroundings and far from Nome and its memories. Being a mining man the new gold fields of Nevada naturally lured him. He drifted from one camp to another looking for the likeliest opening and meeting old Alaskan cronies the while. Recently he went to Goldfield with his wife. Then came the awful day when both of them entered a restaurant and there among the diners sat Count Podhorski, a man that might have been a thousand miles away for all they knew. The shooting followed and now Hines is awaiting the penalty of the law while the wife bitterly weeps over fate.

Captain Smith's Tragic End

A curious tale comes to me across the broad Pacific, sent by a traveler in Orient lands, one who left this city some months ago and who is now in China. It is a tale that embodies a dramatic picture of the last moments of Captain Tremaine Smith of the Siberia who was reported to have committed suicide on that vessel in the harbor of Hongkong some months ago. According to my correspondent Captain Smith did not die by his own hands. He was found in his cabin with his throat cut from ear to ear. The nature of the wound was such that it is almost inconceivable that it was self-inflicted. But that is not the only circumstance that gave rise to the suspicion that Captain Smith did not kill himself. The razor with which the deed was done was found several feet distant from the dead body and it was clasped, and not a drop of blood was to be found between the razor and the body. Captain Smith had a Chinese valet, a boy who was most devoted and faithful to his master. That boy has never been seen since the day of Captain Smith's death. Now it is the theory of many people in Hongkong that Captain Smith had not the courage to commit suicide, but that as he had written to a friend of his purpose, he remained firm in his intention to die and commanded his valet to do the throat cutting. The story is told in Hongkong as an illustration of the wonderful fidelity of Captain Smith's valet.

Musical Criticism

Sometimes I ask myself whether anybody ever reads the musical criticisms that appear in the San Francisco dailies. For I am at times curious to know whether the reporters who are responsible for the output of indiscriminate comment on musical entertainments really receive any recognition for the prodigies of industry which they lavish on a stupid public. It would be interesting to know whether people who are under no compulsion to read the stuff which purports to measure musical performances by accepted standards of art and taste, really do occupy themselves in its perusal. It would be interesting to know whether people with a cultivated taste for music are as easily imposed upon by the reporters as the reporters are by the opera singers and managers whom they interview. I am inclined to believe that these reporters are withdrawn from congenial assignments and sent to the opera because of an editorial delusion, a survival of the tradition that journalism guides public opinion. And I suspect the reporters of writing about the performances in a spirit of contempt for the Philistines that read the papers and whom they hold responsible for the disagreeable duty imposed upon them of potboiling and platitudinizing about matters of which they have no knowledge. Sometimes, I fancy, they pile on the agony in cynical glee over their outrageous unfitness for the duty to which they have been assigned.

Those Cynical Reporters

When the Conried Company was out here with its conglomeration of good, bad and indifferent singers, its antique stars and impudent mediocrities I grew weary remonstrating with the reporters for their shameless exposure of our piteous, benighted provincialism, but since the fire I have become reconciled to the dead level of musical criticism to which the big dailies with the exception of the Call (in which Mr. James Crawford writes intelligently), have fallen. As the exponents of the species of criticism to which I allude make no effort to differentiate between genuine art and talent as acclaimed by the multitude they are entitled at least to commendation for their frankness. There was a time when I insisted that criticism should be hostile to temperamental immodesty and to hollow and insubstantial talent that requires the bolstering of deception and flattery; there was a time when I considered indiscriminate laudation as great a nuisance as the hypercriticism that is morbidly avidious for faults and blunders, but happily I have schooled myself into an amiable attitude toward the rapturous reporters of the whoop-her-up school and now I defy them to get on my insulated nerves. The other day I subjected myself to a most severe test. I read one of the musical exegetes on the subject of the relative merits of Caruso and Constantino, who, as the esoterics of opera know differ mainly in the quality of their respective voices, Caruso being superior to Constantino in that he is able to preserve the purity of his tones throughout the range of his voice. I learned from my young friend that Constantino deserved commendation for one thing—that he did not, like Caruso, fall from pitch. It didn't even jar me. I read it over again to make sure of my immunity and convinced myself of my triumph over banality.

The Great Russell

Far be it from me to deny the reporter the credit of having shrewdly contrived to elevate Constantino by pulling down the glorious-voiced Caruso, but I cannot refrain from recording the impression that the astute journalist received some inspiration from that commercial and artistic genius, Mr. Henry Russell, late of London, who is doing for the operatic art what a Mr. Barnum did for an entirely different species of entertainment. Mr. Russell is a delightful little man who takes curtain-calls with his stars, causing people to wonder who in the devil he is. My impression that he inspired the reporter is due to the fact that I met him one night during a performance of Boheme. It was after the street scene outside of the cafe and he asked me what I thought of it. It was very good, I thought, though it was not remarkable for any extraordinary realization of circumstance. With the air of one who had achieved a great triumph Mr. Russell told me that he had designed it after having spent a long time studying the Latin quarter of Paris. Mr. Russell has encountered so much delicious credulity in San Francisco that I kindly permitted him to think I was greatly amazed at his untiring and hungry attention to detail. Mr. Russell is so kind to venture so far into the darkest depths of the provinces that we should not begrudge him such elation as he is able to derive from the enthusiasm and awe which he believes that he has inspired. When he tells us through Miss Nielsen that he was Melba's teacher, though we know that Melba was the world's greatest singer before she ever met him, what should it profit us to raise a question of veracity?

His Troupe

Mr. Russell is an artistic gentleman and a man of more than ordinary musical attainments, but his musical temperament has never been hostile to his commercial instincts. He is above all things a showman. The San Carlo Opera Company of which he is the guiding genius is an organization possessed of considerable merit. Its performances are well worth the price. Its one great singer is Constantino. But Mr. Russell is justified in making much of the fact that Nordica is a member of the company, for Nordica has long been one of the highest priced of operatic stars, and the public enjoys her singing through the power of self-suggestion just as much as if she were as great as she is believed to be. That she should not venture outside of Wagnerian opera in which her long-distance howl is still of much value is a fact of which opera goers need not be apprized. They get their money's worth out of their consciousness of the fact that putatively she is still of the first rank. As for Alice Nielsen—well she is pretty and acts well and her voice, though neither flexible nor colorful, is at any rate pleasing to the ear. Besides she is a woman of very interesting personality and we all feel so friendly to her that we regret she did not have the benefit of Mr. Russell's wonderful tuition at an earlier stage of her career. And at any rate, in certain light roles, in which there is no demand for subtle nuances or for florid execution she is entirely satisfying. There is one member of the San Carlo Company of whom I expect much in the near future. I refer to Fely Dereyne, who, one of the musical reporters tells us, is a student. Of whom, I would like to know? Is it possible that Mr. Russell has accomplished so much with this young woman, who, in the role of Mussetta is able to carry off the honors in "La Boheme," even with Constantino in the cast? I say that I expect much of her "in the near future," but not that I expect her to achieve much greater perfection in her art. There is not much room for improvement. This so-called student is very young and has not yet made a name for herself, but she has a clear, brilliant voice of wide range, her tones are evenly placed, she has no vocal blemishes to overcome, no crudities of action to tone down. All that she needs to receive attention from the reporters is a metropolitan reputation.

She's No Novice

My colleague, The Bookworm, has taken me to task for writing about "The Cage" as if I conceived it to be the initial literary effort of Charlotte Teller. My colleague knows more about current literature and contemporary bookbuilders than anybody. Thus The Bookworm: Though Charlotte Teller has made a ten-strike with her first book, she ought not to be hailed as a Minerva, springing into the literary life full grown, for she has had a considerable experience in the preliminaries, and of just the character to furnish her with the necessary data and outlook for her decidedly unusual plot. She has been writing more or less since 1899, but is non-committal as to her years. She frankly invites the curious to regard her as "a young genius or a precocious writer," or to take the other course and credit her with not showing her age. As a matter of fact she is neither a "giddy girlie" nor a settled matron. She graduated from the University of Chicago in 1900, but had done some writing during that and the previous year. After graduation she was connected with the Chicago Tribune, reviewing books and making sociological investigations. She reviewed all the books on sociology, economics and psychology, and did similar work for the Journal of Political Economy. She was connected with the Hearst Syndicate, and contributed to Everybody's just after it

The Inadequate Pacific Fleet

It was rumored a short while ago that our sea power in the Pacific was to be strengthened by the detachment of two battleships from the powerful Atlantic fleet for service in Pacific waters. This rumor, I am informed by letter from Washington, is without foundation. Battleships are needed in the Atlantic for show purposes and for show purposes only and therefore they are not to be withdrawn from the Atlantic fleet. Instead of adding to our naval strength in the ocean where we are most likely to have trouble it has been decided to call the squadrons of warships in commission on this Coast and in Asiatic and Philippine waters the Pacific fleet and to give the command to Rear Admiral Willard H. Brownson. The ships are to keep their present stations, but the Admiral may assemble them for general drills and exercises. The most formidable vessels in the Pacific are the four armored cruisers West Virginia, Colorado, Maryland and Pennsylvania now on the Asiatic station. We have nothing on this Coast with which to reinforce the squadrons in the Far East but the antique protected cruisers Chicago and Boston, the modern protected cruisers Charleston and Milwaukee, two gunboats and two destroyers. In an emergency Admiral Brownson would have to depend on his four armored cruisers, which are of one type and vastly inferior to battleships like the Connecticut and Louisiana of the Atlantic fleet. In a short time, however, we shall have twenty-eight battleships ready for commission with two dreadnoughts in prospect and then perhaps the authorities at Washington will be disposed to strengthen the Pacific fleet.

Getting Mining Camp Color

Jack London is making a tour of the Nevada mining camps with a view to picking up local color for future flights in fiction. Being an old Alaskan "sourdough" he is meeting numbers of Yukon friends who have come out of the frozen north to try their fortunes in the new gold fields. January Jones and his wife have Mr. and Mrs. London in tow and are giving them a picturesque time. Numbers of socialists have been urging London to give one of his rousing lectures but he steadfastly declines on the ground that any such discussion at this time might lead to some serious trouble in the critical labor situation now confronting the mining camps. London will be in San Francisco within a week and will then make his final arrangements for starting on his long voyage around the world on the 40-foot ketch-rigged Snark.

Some Grau Anecdotes

had seen several of them die penniless and he was resolved to retire from the operatic field with money. He did so and he left a fortune. Most of his money was made in the stock market. Mr. Grau was accustomed to the dictation of prima donnas, and he said that as he was raised in that school he would never be able to learn any other method of doing business. When a prima donna refused to stand on the terms of her contract he never tried to make her. Year after year he agreed with Mme. Calve that she should sing certain roles, and every year she refused to do so. When asked why such and such an opera was not to be given Mr. Grau never made any further explanation than to say that "Calve says she doesn't want to sing it." He always let the matter stop at that point and never insisted when an artist refused to appear in a role for one reason or another. One of the incidents of his career that always made an impression on him was Mme. Calve's refusal to speak to him in Paris, although he had made her a rich woman and her contract had gradually been raised from $800 to $1,600 an appearance. He never knew to the day of his death why the soprano would not recognize him. Jean de Reszke's remark that Maurice Grau would give a man a cigar, but refuse him the match was the result of his business methods in dealing with all but the great singers. Mr. Grau would willingly pay a prima donna $1,500 a night, but he struggled with all his powers against paying $7 a night for a needed musician in the orchestra, because he thought that singers and not a good orchestra drew the public. He was just as unwilling to pay for any details of a production. One year he introduced a pack of dogs at the end of the first act of "Tannhauser," but after the first performance they were missing. "Not a soul comes into the opera house to see those dogs," he said in answer to an inquiry about their disappearance, "and they cost me $25. I know perfectly well that the stage manager goes over to Eighth avenue and gets them for 50 cents apiece, but I have to pay $2.50 for them. So I cut them out." Mr. Grau never at any stage of his career as a manager pretended to a knowledge of music. He merely engaged the artists that had become famous in Europe.

They Were With the Donners

An interesting affair of last week at Monterey was Mrs. B. L. Hollenbeck's reception on the seventy-fifth birthday of her mother, Mrs. A. G. Lawrey. Mrs. Lawrey has had a most interesting and eventful life. With her father, Judge G. D. Dickinson, who was one of the early pioneers of California, she crossed the plains in an ox wagon more than sixty years ago. They traveled much of the time with the Donner party, and only escaped their fate by hurrying on three days ahead. Many are the exciting stories Mrs. Lawrey tells of experiences in the Mexican War, of moulding bullets all night long, and of encounters with Indians and Mexicans. In 1847 Judge Dickenson moved to Monterey, and he and his family occupied the first brick house, now one of the landmarks of the town. This was built by Mr. Lawrey. Mr. Lawrey had joined the Dickenson wagon train, and with the close association of that long journey across the plains it is not surprising that this stalwart young pioneer and the Judge's pretty daughter should have decided to continue life's journey together. The first bonnet ever brought to Monterey was auctioned, bringing a large sum, and this bit of millinery was presented to Mrs. Lawrey, then Miss Wickenson, as the belle of the town.

Smoking Dens In Woman's Club

I hear that the directors of the Francisco Club are considering ways and means of building a suitable club house of their own. As the members of this exclusive organization number the wealthiest women in town, an achievement in steel and stone ought to be as easily financed as a cot beside a rill. A woman's club in New York which, like the Francisco, makes no pretense at developing high foreheads has just completed a club house which has roused the wee little whimpering reformers into a howling band of iconoclasts. And it's all because the members of this club, which has a social lustre of the Astor-Vanderbilt-Mackay sort and includes besides all the successful professional women in art, literature and stageland, have provided their club house with smoking dens and card rooms. Since they are not the kind of women who consider a club a short-cut to the sort of culture which is served with tea and Ruskin in the provincial clubroom it is not to be expected that their building will please the prurient minded reformers. There are probably a goodly number among these women who do not smoke but not being cursed with a vast provincialism they have no objection to cozy nooks being provided for those who do flirt with the little god Nick O'Teen. There are a number of women on the Francisco membership roll who look kindly on a cigarette, so I am wondering whether they will take the emancipated stand of the New York women and pattern their projected club house after the London model with its smoking and card rooms, or whether they will bury the cigarette under the rose. In their own homes very few San Francisco women make any objection to the cigarette. The weed is now passed quite as freely in the immaculate household with tapestry fittings and safely shaded electric lights as it is in burlaped and candle-lit Bohemia. The debutantes and the dowagers as a rule do not indulge but most of the belles and matrons have cigarettes served with afternoon tea—in fact, there are those whose tea occasionally looks suspiciously like brandy and soda. Their husbands and fathers and brothers evidently make no objection to home consumption of cigarettes but whether they would encourage calling down public odium by providing a woman's club house with smoking rooms is debatable.

Eames and Tevis

The Eames-Story divorcee has given the gossips a stage already set. The "props" are insufficient to give more than a semblance of reality, but the widely alert Gossip has an imagination that does not scruple at supplying all deficiencies. With solemn assurance they whisper that when Madame Eames-Story has been legally divested of the hyphenated end of her name she will be asked to annex that of Dr. Harry Tevis.

Personally I am sure that the rumor will be pricked by a firm denial from all sides but meantime Gossip is having a lovely time. Dr. Tevis has an ingrained artistic temperament which is constantly giving the matchmakers false clues. At one time they insisted that his interest in Lillie Lawlor, the concert singer and protegee of Mrs. Gus Spreckels, was several degrees above platonic. He entertained lavishly in her honor but evidently never entertained any notion of marrying, and the idea was gradually devitalized in the public mind.

Mme. Eames is an intimate friend of Mrs. Fred Sharon, and it was at his sister's home in Paris that Dr. Tevis first met the great singer. She has frequently been his house guest here, in fact, was domiciled at the Harry Tevis home in Taylor street on that memorable April eighteenth, 1906. The piano in that house was considered one of the sweetest toned instruments in the world and many a great musician invoked the spirit of exquisite sound on those marvelous keys. And occasionally it responded to the unprofessional touch of some "horn" musician whose ears had never caught the echo of the world's acclaim but were sensitive to the faintest tonal beauty. There was a little lame girl who was free to come and banish cruel fate with one touch of this magic instrument; and there was a woman, neither young nor beautiful, who came and went whenever the musical mood prompted her. So you see the insistent matchmakers do not understand Harry Tevis, nor can they realize that Orpheus may charm him without Hymen's lurking in the background.

At Del Monte

Del Monte is very attractive just now—its lawns aglow with hyacinths, crocuses and tulips. The fruit trees are scattering their fragrant petals, the maple trees are bursting into their buds so like fairy wings poised for flight. Youth and old age are suggested as one looks from these to the ancient sentinels of pines and hoary oaks, with gray moss swaying in the breeze. And there are old friends now at Del Monte to appreciate its varying moods. Mrs. Peter H. Ballantine of Newark, New Jersey, has not been here for sixteen years, but she is here now with her daughter and Mrs.

They were on the eighth floor of the St. Francis on April 18, but their children were at Del Monte with their nurse. The Thornes left the city in an automobile as the Palace was burning and were the first to bring down here any news of the disaster. * * * For several weeks there were no Saturday night hops at Del Monte, the big ball room having been in the hands of plasterers and carpenters who have transformed it into one of the best exhibition halls on the Coast. Last week the work was nearly completed, and on Saturday night there was the usual ball. Miss Dora Coe, the daughter of Theodore Coe of Newark, New Jersey, is always the life of these affairs. Miss Coe is very much of a belle with both officers and civilians. Colonel Coe and his attractive daughter have been here for a couple of months, and expect to remain some time longer. * * * There has been much entertaining at the Post in honor of the departing Fourteenth Cavalry, which leaves to make room for the School of Musketry to be established here. #### She's a Torrid Critic

"Stockton society," writes a correspondent, "is 'all worked up' over the stinging criticisms indulged in by a haughty grande dame who has a habit of looking down on lesser mortals in her own circle. At a recent reception she shocked the guests in the dressing-room by referring to the silver on the dresser as junk. And this reception she took occasion to josh at a luncheon some days later. This iconoclastic spirit is considered perfectly dreadful in Stockton."

But They're Not Broke

According to my Stockton correspondent it is quite possible in that bustling town to strike a pace that is highly disastrous to a large fortune. "The Frank Hillmans," says my correspondent, "who built themselves a mansion in the northern section of the town, and who have been cutting a wide swath, have reached a point where there is nothing between them and a cruel world but the interest on $60,000 which sum was left in trust by Mrs. Hillman's father. Mrs. Hillman was looked upon some time ago as the richest woman in San Joaquin county, but as the Hillmans have mortgaged their property and let all but one of their servants go and dispensed with their automobile, the village gossips have come to the conclusion that economy is imperative."

A Steinegger Pupil Recital

The pupils of Emil Steinegger gave a delightful recital last Saturday afternoon, at 924 Grove street, the occasion being a class meeting. Among the most interesting of the performers were Margaret Evans, Hazel Dey, Elsie Harwood, Clara Roek, Charlotte Williams, Emily Wilhelm, Miriam Hampton and Edwin Horrisberger.

The Mansfeldt Concert

The Mansfeldt Club gave another of their interesting concerts on Wednesday of last week at Lyric Hall to a much larger audience than the inclement weather would have led one to expect. The Associate Membership of the Club grows continually, and the standard of the concerts becomes perceptibly higher, as is evident from the ambitious undertaking of Miss Baldwin, who was programmed for the extremely exacting Chopin Concerto in E minor. Miss Baldwin's musical achievements have hitherto always been praiseworthy, but she is entitled to special congratulations for having given a really interesting performance of this concerto,

MRS. ETHEL DUKE-DEAN

one of the most difficult things written for the piano. The programme was opened by Mrs. Ethel Duke-Dean, who contributed three Brahms numbers in musicianly fashion, infusing some of the lush sentiment of Southern Germany into the concluding Capriccio. Mrs. Dean's playing, while not of the brilliant order, is commendable for its exceeding good taste and is always enjoyable. Miss Frances Wilson made her initial bow in public as a pianist and must be credited with a complete success. There was not the slightest indication in her playing or manner of amateurishness, and she gave delightful interpretations to the two pretty Sjoezren "Eroticon." The Mendelssohn "Auf Fluezein des Gesanges" proved Miss Wilson to be possessed of real musical feeling, and it was most artistically played. Her final number was the Strauss-Schutt "Geschichten aus dem Wiener Wald," which completely captivated her listeners by its verve, to which was joined an admirable clarity of technic. Miss Wilson is a decided acquisition to the club, and her distinguished blonde beauty adds greatly to the interest of her performance. The next concert will take place about the middle of May.

Easter Music at St. Dominic's

The Easter music at St. Dominic's Church will this year be unusually interesting, by reason of the first performance of Dr. Stewart's new mass, which has been written for the occasion. During the mass the following numbers will be sung: "Vidi Aquam," Stewart; "Victimae Paschali" (sequence), Stewart; "Dextera Domine", (offertory) Cesar Franck. The music will be rendered by a large choir and orchestra under the direction of Dr. Stewart. The soloists are Mrs. B. Apple, Miss Leola S. Stone, T. G. Elliott and Harold Pracht.

Artist Best Has Returned

Mr. A. W. Best has just returned from a sketching trip through the southern part of the state with a large number of sketches of the Missions and other points of interest. It was owing to Mr. Best's absence that the usual fall exhibition of the work of his pupils was postponed until the spring. It will be held at the Best studio, 57 Noe street. Mr. Best, by the way, was the first of the local artists to resume work after the fire. He reopened his art school last June and has since been obliged to enlarge the premises in order to accommodate the young men and women who are studying illustrating and painting under his direction. The Best art school has been in existence about ten years and it was in that school that many of the most prominent illustrators in the country learned the rudiments of their art. Mr. Best appears to have a faculty for producing good results in a short time.

Juliet Crosby

Widespread and deep was the sorrow caused by the sad tidings of the death of Juliet Crosby; and profound the sympathy for Frederic Belasco that was stirred in the hearts of thousands when they learned of his terrible affliction. The stroke by which Mr. Belasco was bereft of a wife quickened in thousands the sense of a personal loss. For by a large element of this community Juliet Crosby was regarded with feelings of warm affection. It is natural for people to take an interest in the women of the stage by whom their emotions have been stirred, their thoughts exalted and their cares dissipated, but this interest is intensified in the case of an actress who has seen fit to emerge from the domain of illusions and enter into the social life of those who have witnessed the development of her art and have identified her with the roles that she has vitalized in the mimic world. It was thus with Juliet Crosby. We knew her as a sincere and conscientious and modest actress and we knew her also as the wife of Frederic Belasco, and when she was on the stage we loved her for her fine womanly qualities as well as for the delight she gave us by her splendid performances. Juliet Crosby possessed traits of character that endeared her as much to her associates as to the patrons of the Alcazar. Her death was a shock to the community.

A Descendant of Joe Miller

Mr. J. Miller, who comes from New York to stage "Fantana" for the San Francisco Opera Company at the American Theatre, not only comes from Philadelphia but is a lineal descendant of the famous "Joe," of joke book fame. As his home in the Quaker City he has a parchment copy of the original chicken cross the street wheeze, written in Early English on parchment, vellum and illuminated by the Roycroft Society of the period of 1776. Mr. Miller, when in New York, is the general assistant stage director for the Shubert Bros.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra

Arrangements for the concerts by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra are rapidly approaching completion, and by next week Manager Greenbaum will announce full particulars. Among the compositions to be played is a "Suite" by the famous leader of the organization Alexander von Fielitz. These orchestral concerts will close Mr. Greenbaum's musical season, which, considering the disaster of less than a year ago, has been a marvelous one. Who would have thought that we should have such artists as Rosenthal, Schumann-Heink, de Gogorza, Gabrilowitsch, the Petschnikoffs, a season of Grand Opera and Symphony Concerts by a big Eastern organization all within less than a year of the awful catastrophe?

The Florence Roberts Engagement

Florence Roberts, than whom there is no stronger favorite with the theatregoers of this city, will doubtless be greeted by a crowded house at the Novelty Theatre next Monday night, when she will appear in the emotional drama, "The Strength of the Weak," which has been rewritten since it was last seen in this city. Miss Roberts achieved a great personal triumph in New York, a fact that has given great pleasure to her local admirers. That much interest is taken in the coming engagement is evidenced by the large advance sale of seats. Supporting the star will appear such well-known players as Chas. Kent, C. J. Williams, Lucius Henderson, Ruth Allen, Mary Bertrand, Moselle Tatum and Florence Robinson. "The Strength of the Weak" as now staged by Florence Roberts is said to be a magnificent production. There will be a Saturday matinee.

Sousa's Latest

"The Free Lance," the latest composition of the March King, John Philip Sousa, is the attraction scheduled for next week at the Van Ness Theatre. Joseph Cawthorn is the star comedian of the company. "The Free Lance" company is one of the largest of the Klaw and Erlanger musical organizations, and the production is said to be most elaborate. The libretto of the piece is by Harry B. Smith and the music is characteristically Sousa's.

Great Vaudeville at the Orpheum

Next week's programme will reach the highest possible standard of vaudeville excellence. Edwin Stevens who heads the bill needs no eulogy. His genius and infinite variety have been acknowledged and applauded in every city of the Union. He has indeed played many parts in his time and the same success which has attended him in drama and comic opera seems to have followed him in vaudeville. His contribution will be an original skit entitled "A Night Out," in which he will have the support of Miss Marshall, a clever young actress. Charley Case, "the man who talks about his father," will be warmly welcome. He is always one of the best numbers on a programme and the nonsensical songs which he so drolly warbles and his amusing reminiscences of his "old man" never fail to convulse his audiences with laughter. The La Maze brothers, an apparently boneless trio, who have no superiors as knockabout comedians, are included in the list of novelties. The Joseph Adelman Trio, European xylophone virtuosos, Julius Tannen in new and witty stories, Merri Osborne in her diverting farce, "The Taming of An Actress," and Dan Burke and his school girls are the holdovers. It will be positively the last week of Mr. Burke and his fascinating colleagues who have delightfully impressed the public with one of the most quaintly charming acts in the memory of Orpheum patrons.

The "Kreutzer Sonata"

Manager Kurtzig of the Colonial Theatre announces that for the week beginning next Monday night the Colonial Stock Company will present for the first time in the West a dramatization of Count Tolstoi's "Kreutzer Sonata." This is an intensely interesting drama, dealing with life in Russia, but not with the familiar miseries of the Czar's subjects. It deals with the troubles of an unfaithful wife who marries a nobleman for his money and who plans an elopement with her former sweetheart. Due to this state of affairs many thrilling climaxes are brought about. The "Kreutzer Sonata" should arouse almost as much

Musicians Heard From

Edward Long, who was for many years one of the tenors of the double quartette at St. Dominic's Church, received a letter the other day from Dr. F. S. Palmer who was for several years organist of St. Dominic's, informing him that he is soon to take charge of the music of the beautiful new Catholic Cathedral in Seattle. A grand organ is now being built for the cathedral in Boston at a cost of $25,000 under Dr. Palmer's specifications. Dr. Palmer is at present organist of All Saints' Church in New York. He writes that Rhys Thomas who was formerly tenor of the Tivoli and also of St. Dominic is now in business in New York City and draws a salary of $1,000 a year for singing in a church in a New York suburb. Professor J. H. Howe, who, also, was organist of St. Dominic's at one time, is now, Mr. Long informs me, doing well musically and financially in Seattle.

At Ye Liberty

"In Arkansaw," a rural drama, is the attraction at Ye Liberty Playhouse this week. It is a play that abounds in heart interest, and the Liberty players are exploiting its emotional potentialities with a success that is made manifest by the responsiveness of enthusiastic audiences. The play in preparation is "The Prince and the Pauper."

From Nanon to Wang

The old familiar operetta "Nanon" has proved a felicitous revival at Idora Park, where it is being sung in fine style by an excellent company. Genee's rollicking tunes, delightful in their simplicity, have been brought back once more to lips that are quick to respond to sensations imparted to the ear. From "Nanon" the Idora company will soon skip blithely to "Wang."

In the Limelight

"Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" has been playing to large audiences during the past week at the Van Ness. The engagement will come to a close on Sunday night. Madge Carr Cook will always be remembered for her artistic interpretation of the title role of this unique comedy.

When Henrietta Crosman makes her appearance at the Van Ness Theatre it will be in the farcical comedy, "All-of-a-Sudden Peggy" and the new play called "The Almighty Dollar."

Florence Roberts has in contemplation two new plays for presentation during her forthcoming engagement at the Novelty Theatre.

The Daly Opera Company is to be the attraction at the Van Ness Theatre for two weeks commencing Monday, April 8. The company is a very large one and — "Those Lustrous Eyes are Murine Eyes." Murine Eye Remedy Makes Dull Eyes Bright. Sick Eyes Well. Soothes and Quickly Cures Ailing Eyes.

appears in elaborate productions of "The Country Girl" and "The Cingalee." The entire Daly's Theatre production will be brought to the Van Ness Theatre.

Mrs. Leslie Carter is to make her appearance at the Novelty Theatre shortly in her greatest success, "Du Barry."

Nat C. Goodwin in his latest success, "The Genius," is booked for the Novelty Theatre. Goodwin contemplates giving us his version of Shylock during the engagement.

BERTRAM LYTELL.

Leading Man at the New Alcazar Theatre.

Petschnikoff, the greatest Russian violinist and his beautiful and talented American wife. These artists were the principal feature of the big Mozart Festival at Salzburg last year where their playing of the Mozart double concerto for violin and viola caused a sensation. This is the number that they will play at the Greek Theatre with the University Orchestra Thursday, April 11, on which occasion Mr. Petschnikoff will also play the Tschaiowsky Concerto. At the first San Francisco concert which will be given at Lyric Hall, Saturday afternoon next, (April 6), the talented couple will play the Bach double concerto, a movement from the Spohr double concerto, and Mr. Petschnikoff will play the Mendelssohn Concerto, Saint Saens' "Le Cygne" and a "Russian Dance" of his own composition. At the Sunday matinee, April

The samurai of ancient times before committing hara-kiri indited a farewell ode. The lady who preferred death to dishonor wrote her last verse with the intrepid hand that was soon to twist her scarlet undergirdle about her neck—and at the present day many poems are written in difficulty and in danger—on sick beds and death beds. And young unhappy lovers about to leave this world together cast their last thoughts into poetic form for the delectation of their survivors.

But what, it will be inquired, is the form of this most popular poetry? What rules of prosody are favored by Japanese poets? Do their methods in any way, resemble our own? There is only one form of Japanese poetical expression, and there has been only one from the beginning of its history down to the present time. A Japanese verse consists of four alternate lines of five and seven syllables, with sometimes an additional line of seven syllables at the end. A Japanese poem may be as long as a page or a page and a half, but the great majority are little odes of thirty-one syllables, the lines being arranged thus:—5, 7, 5, 7, 7. For example:—

5. Hototogisu
7. Nakitsuru kato wo
5. Nagamureba
7. Tada ari-ake wo
7. Tsaki zo nokoreru

That is literally:—

“When I look towards the place where the cuckoo has been singing, nought remains but the moon in the early dawn.”

Now, it must be said at the outset that the foreigner and the alien and one not acquainted with the language who tries to understand and appreciate the beauties of Japanese poetry is beset by difficulties on every side.

First, there is the translation and all that any poem must inevitably lose thereby. Gone at a single stroke are all delicate shades of meaning and expression; all the original sound of the words (which counts for so much in poetry) and that indefinable quality which might almost be called the color of the poet's thought. Then it is well nigh impossible for our Western minds to feel the atmosphere of these poems or to be in sympathy with their ideals. What is musical to the Japanese is not musical to us; what is pathetic to them is not pathetic to us; what is humorous to them is not humorous to us. And for this there are two reasons—the fundamental and tremendous difference that exists between the mind or soul of the Western and that of the Far Eastern; for between West and East there is a great gulf fixed, which may never be bridged over—not by wars or ships or progress or civilization. And, secondly, there are still few foreigners whose knowledge is not at the best superficial of Japanese ways of life, of Japanese customs, history, religions, superstitions, traditions, morals, and character; for the Japanese are a reserved people, intelligently taking in all the world's information, but giving out very little. Through ignorance, therefore, or through prejudice, much of their poetry is to us incomprehensible, ridiculous, or commonplace. Take, for instance, an ode written by the Empress of Japan to an English lady who was about to leave that country for her home—

"Why does the long-necked goose return to her native land?" This ode is really good Japanese poetry, and has been praised by competent judges; but the unfortunate word goose spoils it utterly for our ears; in fact, merely on account of a Western association, renders it irredeemably ridiculous. But looked at without prejudice, there is nothing wrong with the ode. Wild geese, at any rate, such as the poet speaks of, are picturesque and beautiful birds, and the image of such a bird flying with out-stretched wings, and long graceful neck, towards home, is truly poetic. Wild geese, by the way, would seem a favorite subject with the Japanese poet, for another ode is, being translated—

"The moon on an autumn night making visible the very number of the wild geese that fly past with wings intercrossed in the white clouds."

A young Japanese student was once discovered by his English Professor in ecstasies over a poetry book. On the latter inquiring what had so greatly excited his admiration, the youth said that he had read a poem of extraordinary beauty, but that he found it difficult to give an adequate English rendering. After much cogitation, he produced the following as the translation of his soul-inspiring ode:—"I sat on a mat and looked at Fugi Yama." It certainly has the merit of simplicity, but one is irresistibly reminded of "Reading without Tears," the "harmless necessary cat" alone is absent.

It will be realized, then, that Japanese poetry, to be at all appreciated, must be approached in no light or careless spirit, but with patient sympathy, and a sincere desire to understand.

Perhaps it may be asked: "But is there, after all, any real poetry, divine spark, ideal—call it what you will—in this odd elliptical stuff, this often seeming aimless stringing together of words? And even if there does exist such soul or ideal, can it ever appeal to other than Far Eastern born or student enthusiast?"

It is certain that there is something in Japanese poetry, and certain, also, that its essential aims and ideas are quite opposed to those of English poetry. The English poet, as well as the English artist, presents his ideas, his inspirations, his conception. He gives it in its entirety, and the plainer, clearer, more perfectly constructed, and highly-finished it is, the better. A good solid foundation of thought, or fact—or it may be romance—is considered necessary. A poem must be beautiful; it also must be interesting. There must be something to take hold of, some sense in it. The avowed aim of the Japanese artist, poet, and painter alike, is not to give a finished picture. His art is to suggest, and to suggest only; he would awake an idea in the mind, he would just sound a note in the soul, to go on echoing alone. He would drop a stone into the waters of the imagination, he would make poets of us all. Of a perfectly finished and limited composition the Japanese critic says ittakiri, meaning—all told, such a work is considered inartistic.

The spirit of Japanese poetry, and that of Japanese painting are one and the same. It is only of late years that many in this country have appreciated the latter, and the appreciation of the former, attended as it is by obvious difficulties is as yet a thing of the future. Japanese art may be difficult to understand in the first place, but it grows upon one more and more; its restraint is so admirable that other art is in danger of appearing almost vulgarly exuberant by its side.

There are still English people who vote the most exquisite things Japanese—very odd, grotesque, or, at the most, quaint and queer. I am aware that many will at first think this poetry queer—or sometimes even less than commonplace. I freely confess that I did so at first myself; and I may add that I possess but a very superficial knowledge of the Japanese language, that I have read no Japanese poetry in the original, my experience being from impromptu translations by Japanese friends and from the few English verses that now exist. Here are some scraps of poetic expression:—

CONSTANT LOVE

Not for the little moment
That the harvest lightening plays,
On the standing ears of barley
Can my heart forget thy praise."

WINTER FANCY

"T'was a bitter night, the dawn is come
O'er the mountain and through the snow.
My fancy would wander to unknown climes,
But where is the path to go?"

DELUSION

"A petal fell from the cherry tree
And then flew back again;
It was a butterfly!"

FOR THE DEAD

"I whispered a prayer at the grave: a Butterfly rose and fluttered,
Thy spirit, perhaps, dear friend?"

"This light of the moon that plays on the water I pour for the dead,
Differs nothing at all from the moonlight of other years."

MOONLIGHT ON THE SEA

"Oh, vapoury moon of spring—would that one pluge into ocean
Could win me renewal of life as a part of thy light on the waters."

HAPPY POVERTY

"Wafted into my room, the scent of the flowers of the plum tree
Changes my broken window into a source of delight."

FAREWELL SONG

"My dear younger sister, Thine Augustness? Though thou say that thou wilt not weep—if, like the flocking birds, I flock and depart—if, like the led birds, I am led away and depart—thou wilt hang down thy head like a single eulalia upon the mountain, and thy weeping shall indeed rise as the mist of the morning shower. Thine Augustness that art like the young herbs." This is from the Ko-ji-ki, or "Record of Ancient Matters," which contains the mythology of Japan, and was completed in A.D. 712. It is to be found in the section called "The Wooing of the Deity of Eight Thousand Spears."

The following, also from the Ko-ji-ki, is sung by the Emperor Jim-mu when about to smite the Prince of Tomi:—

"The children of the augustly powerful army will smite and finish the one stem of wild chive in the millet field—the stem of its root, both its root and shoots."

The wild chive among the millet is, of course, the enemy—the Prince of Tomi and his army.

These poems have all of them some thought; some germ of feeling, however faint, is absolutely expressed. But there are many poems that are not more than word pictures. These are particularly difficult for a stranger to grasp. For instance, there does not seem to be much in the following:—

"Old Temple—bell voiceless—cherry flowers fall."

This atom is entitled "Loneliness," and to the initiated certainly conveys the pathos of the wanderer, pausing to rest at some deserted shrine.

Here is another:—

"In the mountain temple the mosquito curtain is lighted by the dawn: sound of waterfall."

And, lastly, a subtle description of gallant, careless poverty—where humor and pathos are marvellously balanced.

"Heavily pours the rain on the cloak that I stole from the scarecrow."

"The Pass"

Stewart Edward White is altogether too modest when he asserts in his appendix note to "The Pass," 'Anybody could have done it.' Anybody who could span Niagara on a tight rope, or fill the position of a "steeple jack" might, but there are a considerable number of people who, though they might be willing to undertake the ordinary and extraordinary hardships of a long camping trip, simply would not be able to keep their heads at dizzy heights, nor prevent pack-animals from pitching headlong over precipices by "main strength and awkwardness." Nevertheless, this is no reason why we should quarrel with our author, and if we cannot do the things which he has done, it is still a pleasure and a satisfaction to be invited to accompany him in print. "The Pass" embodies an account of a summer spent in the high Sierras, with the feat of Pioneering a pass, the studying out of routes, the making of trails, bridging of chasms and explorations of "no thoroughfares," with daunts and—one may not say disappointments, where Mr. White is concerned, but set-backs which would have disheartened any but a born pioneer. Incidental to the actual work which made the principal recreation of the vacation trip, there is an interesting exposition of the work of the forest ranger, which makes one hope that some of the government experts who know forests only on their maps will prick up their ears and take notice, and the catalogue of the camp library induces the regret that the author can never know the pleasure of coming unexpectedly on one of his own books, as fresh and invigorating to himself as it is to others. There is no way of describing one of Stewart Edward White's volumes. One lives through them rather than reads, and they are so friendly, so companionable, full of interesting anecdotes, bits of wood and mountain lore, and practical hints for the camper, that they are better than guide books. The illustrations of "The Pass" are from photographs, but the page margins are decorated with appropriate drawings. Book publishing is a new enterprise for the Outing Company, and "The Pass" is one of their first volumes. It is an artistic piece of work and promises well for the publishers, who will make a specialty of outdoor literature.

Owners of runabouts, which have proven so popular this season, are in a fair way to have trouble sooner or later in ascending grades owing to the position of the gasoline tank. The tanks are generally placed under the seat as in touring cars but owing to the lower position of the seats the fall between the gasoline tank and the carburetor is not so great. Consequently on steep grades the fuel supply is sometimes cut off. This result has been avoided in the Thomas Forty runabout by connecting a small air pump just to the left of the driver's seat with the gasoline tank by which pressure is maintained and a constant flow kept up in case of an emergency.

The Grilling of Greet

Ben Greet has been found out in New York. When Ben Greet first visited this city to be acclaimed by the culturines Town Talk took occasion to pronounce him the Barnum of the drama and to tell the reason why. But he had a New York reputation achieved largely with the aid of his leading woman, Edith Wynne

Archaeology has as little to do with a dramatic performance as text worship, but Mr. Greet not only insists upon it as if his life depended upon it but goes utterly wrong as to essential facts of universal knowledge. And the worst of it is that his errors are all of a kind to deprive his performances of precisely the rapid and easy brilliancy which is the only justification of reverting to Shakespeare's scenic arrangements. To begin with a comparatively trifling matter, it is not recorded that there were Beefeaters stationed at either side of Shakespeare's stage, or that the scene shifters were bluecoat boys. Why should they now clog the stage and distract attention from the lines and action? And why should the actors in an Italian play appear in Elizabethan costume? Shakespeare's actors did so, but to produce anything like the effect Mr. Greet and his company would have to appear in trousers; and

ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF

MRS. ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF

Matthison, who did not accompany him to San Francisco, and despite the fact that his performances were worse than mediocre he was acclaimed for his highly intellectual treats. He is again in New York, and now he is told that since he lost the co-operation of Miss Matthison he has nobody of any real distinction or claim to a hearing. John Corbin has been writing of Greet in precisely the same strain in which he was discussed in this paper. Says Corbin, apropos a recent production of "The Merchant of Venice":

"In the question of stage settings and the conduct of the successive scenes there is no law of necessity. They are bad, and, it must be concluded, willfully bad.

even that might fall upon our minds with something more than the effect of Elizabethan disregard of historical accuracy. The Elizabethan costume is most unpicturesque, and to insist on it is needlessly to offend the modern eye. The great, the incredible defect of the production is that it is set on a stage representing not that of the Fortune or the Globe theatre, but that of the Middle Temple Hall. It is true that one of Shakespeare's comedies once happened to be played there. But it was not this one, and in any case the performance could only have been awkward and cramped. Far from being small, Shakespeare's stage was larger than any here in New York, with two or three exceptions. Certainly it was considerably larger than the unusually ample stage at the Garden Theatre. But instead of using his opportunity to the utmost Mr. Greet still insists on his narrow Middle Temple dimensions. The result is to intensify the dullness and impotence of the actors.

"Especially harmful is the fact that none of the scenic appurtenances of Shakespeare's stage is at hand—the alcove, the gallery and the window at the side. In all of the plays each and sometimes every one of these is essential to the effective conduct of scenes that were written to make use of them. In 'The Merchant of Venice' the curtained alcove served to hide and disclose Portia's caskets, and again, the curtain being drawn back, to set the trial scene. It was at the window at the side that Jessica appeared and threw down the jewels and money to Lorenzo. As Mr. Greet manages these scenes they are ineffective to the point of absurdity. The apartment for the caskets is thrust forward into the centre of the stage and stays there, always to the confusion of the actors. Jessica climbs a stepladder and peers over the scenery. If only Mr. Greet's own fortunes were at stake it would be possible to pass the matter by in silence. But, as it happens, he has made himself sponsor of the cause of regenerating the art of producing Shakespeare. That is a cause of moment, and his pettifogging archaeology and devitalizing management have given it what is sometimes called a black eye. His propaganda, which should have meant the joy of true and great art, has meant only deadly dullness and boredom. Why, no one knows. It is easier to do the right thing than the wrong, and the expense is a trifle in comparison with the artistic and popular effect to be achieved. That Mr. Greet should persist in his error is as inexcusable as it is incomprehensible, for it will take the public a long time to learn that the rightly Shakespearean production is not a thing to be sidestepped."

Shuberts' "Fantana"

The managers of the San Francisco Opera Company and of the American Theatre are neglecting no detail that might contribute to the success of the coming production of Shubert Brothers' "Fantana," which will be presented for the first time in this city on Easter Sunday afternoon. "Fantana" is one of the most successful of the latest musical comedies. The book is by Robert B. Smith and the late Sam S. Shubert. It contains more comedy than any other half dozen musical comedies. The music is by Raymond Hubbell and is of the whistly order. Among its many song hits are "A Lesson in Etiquette," "It is the Girl, Not the Horse That Wins the Prize," "Drop In On Me at Luncheon," "The Farewell Waltz," "Darby and Joan," "My Word," "Laughing Little Almond Eyes," "The Lily of the Valley," "What Would Mrs. Grundy Say?" "The Secret," "The Girl at the Helm," "His Little Sister," "That's Art," "Just My Style."

"Fantana" will be the means of introducing to San Francisco theatregoers Miss Florence Sinnott, one of the prettiest and most talented soubrettes on the operatic stage. Miss Sinnott was the original "Daisy," in Pixley and Luders' "Burgomaster," "Brenda," in "The Silver Slipper," "Trixie," in "The Wizard of Oz," and last season she divided honors with Eddie Foy in "The Earl and the Girl." Mr. J. Albert Wallerstedt, the young baritone, who made such a splendid impression at the Tivoli Opera House during the season of 1905 and who recently appeared as the principal baritone in Lulu Glaser's "Dolly Varden" and Richard Carle's "The Mayor of Tokio," will also appear in "Fantana." The piece will be staged under the direction of George Lask, stage director for the San Francisco Opera Company, and Joseph Miller, assistant general stage director for the Shuberts.

Sanskrit Play In Greek Theatre

"The Little Clay Cart," which is to be produced at the Greek Theatre on the evening of April sixth, is a play that has never been produced in the United States. It is one of the finest samples of Hindu literature. Although written fifteen hundred years ago the theme is still young and the handling of it is exquisite. Pathos and humorous situations crowd rapidly upon each other, and the play comes to a happy end with the hero and heroine living happy ever afterwards. Among the points of interest that should be noted are the use of the double stage,—a device by which, through the help of two sets of footlights and a raised platform, a street and the interior of a house are shown at the same time. The performers have been coached by Garnett Holme, ably assisted by Dr. Ryder, the learned Professor of Sanskrit University, whose translation it is that will be used. In addition to these gentlemen, the Hindu scholars, Swami Prakashamanda and Swami Trigunatita, have given their valuable assistance with regard to details of Hindu customs and costumes. Two Indian undergraduates will appear in the play. The prologue is to be spoken by Babu Chakravati and the hymn of Sheba will be recited by Babu Das. In the last act of the play an oriental bazaar will dazzle the spectators.

MISS ISABELLE McREYNOLDS
As "Vasantasena" in "The Little Clay Cart."

The Dreadful Soul of Woman

The hall-door slammed after Menzies. They saw his carriage pass the window, and heard the Sister's footsteps re-ascending the stairs.

"Oh, my God! she is not coming back!" was the thought that flamed across the woman's brain.

Dr. Hallam took a step towards her, and instinctively she took a step back. The silence seemed to shriek at her. The look in his eyes turned her faint.

"This—this is really a good nursing home?" she asked, impelled with an irresistible desire to break the oppressive stillness.

When she had said it, she wanted to laugh aloud at the puerility of the question.

"It is the best in London," he answered gravely, advancing further.

She took another step back, and her heel touched the fender. Her hat brushed against the vases on the mantelpiece. She stood at bay, and her eyes met his in a long, searching glance.

The doctor took the woman's slim white wrists in his. Her eyes fell before his passionate gaze. He was strong. It would have been useless to resist him. Nor did the woman try to resist. She shut her eyes, and her whole face quivered under his kiss. He kissed her—he kissed her. The room was still. Outside, an occasional passing carriage broke the silence.

At last she pushed him away and raised her head.

"Is this mere brutality?" she asked in a strange cold voice. "Or do you find me magnetic?"

"You are lovely!" said the man for answer.

"You do not know me," she returned, faintly.

"You only met me three weeks ago, and never to this day alone. You cannot love me. Why—why do you torment me—when I am so troubled?"

"You do not know me," he answered. "You cannot love me. You love your husband, I know. And he—But you don't resist me!"

She shuddered and her eyes fell. "You must be mad!" she exclaimed. "Mad! to dare—"

"Love is mad. Do you find me magnetic?" he pursued, smiling.

"Magnetic! You are the devil!" she cried, shrinking away.

He laughed softly, and put his arms around her again. The woman lay against his breast like a shattered flower, passive, motionless.

"I am the devil, you say," he repeated in her ear. "I am the devil, but you let me kiss you. I am the devil, but I love you! You have the most beautiful lips in the world. You are a beautiful woman—and I love you!"

"Oh, don't call it that," she said. "He called it that—my husband of twelve years—my lover and friend."

"You have only known me three weeks," he whispered in triumph.

"Oh, what has come to me, what has come to me!" she sobbed, wildly. "I who put myself on such a pedestal! This can't be me; it is some fearful dream from hell!—and you—you are a hateful man * * *"

"Yet you love me!" he said again; and the fire in his voice scattered the last of her weak defenses. She flung her arms round his neck of her own accord.

"My God! what kind of man are you!" she panted. "I thought I knew myself! I thought I knew myself!"

"We never know ourselves until we love," he said, slowly, looking into her eyes with a look that made her tremble. "The mirror which Passion holds up to our gaze is different to the one we have learned from day by day—very, very different. There are strange turnings and byeways in the heart of man and woman; and until we have explored them all we do not know ourselves."

She was kissing him back passionately now. They tore themselves apart as the door-handle rattled.

"Your husband is asking for you," said the Sister, entering. "Will you come upstairs?"

A white despair settled on the woman's face. She pressed her handkerchief to her desecrated lips. She put her hand to her throat as if she choked.

"I cannot go to my husband," she said, dully. "I cannot go to my husband."

Easter Customs

By Sarah Connell

On the evening of Holy Saturday the Irish peasants make elaborate preparations for the "finishing of lent." The house is scrupulously cleaned and a feast prepared—a fat hen, a piece of bacon or some other dish of flesh meat being the principal viand, but woe be to the one who would taste it before the Easter cock has crowed. The young people gather in and wait in expectancy, frequently spending the time in reciting the rosary or other prayers. But as soon as chanicleer sounds his note there is a joyous clapping of hands and a shout of "Out with Lent." The midnight feast is then enjoyed and perhaps an hour of frolic, but as all must arise by four o'clock to "see the sun dance," the festivities are not prolonged. The custom of seeing the sun dance is an ancient one, and though the better informed people have for generations ceased to believe that any such phenomenon takes place, it is the general custom to arise early and pay tribute to the ancient superstition. Both Thomas Hardy and Eden Phillpotts tell us of the Devonshire and Wessex folk, especially the "ancients," clinging to the old custom and belief.

There was formerly an odd custom observed at Portaferry in County Down of kissing women on Easter Monday. There was a pleasant walk near the town where the men congregated and saluted women without regard to age, station or condition. No offense was meant and none taken, but the women who through design or inadvertence, made her appearance at "The Walter," could make no complaint. Manifestly, the wise course was to stay at home, but the women and girls, almost to a unit, were usually on hand not to participate—Oh, no! but merely to see the fun.

In rural England, besides the custom of "seeing the sun dance," the peasants and children still revel in hard boiled eggs, with which they play various games. In Lancashire and neighboring counties there is a ridiculous custom of "lifting," or "heaving" still in force. On Easter Monday the men lift the women, and on the following day the compliment is returned. What its origin or object no one seems to know. The process is performed by two lusty men or women grasping each other by the wrists. Then the one who is to be "lifted" is seated on one of their arms and raised aloft two or three times and even carried for some distance along the street. Even strangers are not exempt. A grave clergyman who happened to be passing through Lancashire was obliged to stop over for an hour or two in one of the villages, and was astonished to have a number of lusty damsels rush into his room unannounced, exclaiming that they had "come to lift him." Not being aware of the custom the amazed divine exclaimed: "To lift me! What can you mean?" "Why, your reverence, we've come to lift 'ee 'cause it's Easter Tuesday." "Lift me because it is Easter Tuesday? I don't understand. Is it a custom here?" "Iss, to be sure; why don't 'ee know? All us women was lifted yesterday, and us lifts the men in turn, and in course it's our rights and duties to lift 'en." After some parley, the reverend traveler compromised by paying half a crown to escape the dreaded compliment. In Durham the men claim the privilege of taking off the women's shoes on Easter Monday, and the women reciprocate on the day following.

In the Tyrol the Easter ceremonies begin on Saturday. Bands of musicians traverse the mountain paths singing Easter hymns, and calling the people to their doors to join in the choruses. The wide brimmed hats are adorned with flowers and all are in holiday costume. As night comes on they carry torches to light their way. The housewives present them with gaily dyed Easter eggs and at the higher class of houses they are refreshed with wine as well. Baskets of smoked meats, hard boiled eggs, white bread and horse-radish are carried to the church on Easter morning to be blessed. The Easter feast is begun with portions of the consecrated food, and any visitor to the house during Easter tide is offered a share just as Christmas cheer is provided.

Easter is the most important feast in the Greek church. On that day all the cities of Greece present a novel spectacle of cleanliness. Banqueting is one of the principal features of the observation, and the odor of roasting meat and of pies and cakes greets the nostrils. All the inhabitants in holiday attire hasten to make calls and receive congratulations, and as each meets an acquaintance he greets him with a kiss on each cheek and the salutation, "Christ is risen," to which the orthodox reply is either "Christ has risen indeed," or "And hath appeared unto Simon." Guns are fired from all the batteries and the reports are echoed in the incessant firing of pistols by the soldiery. In the evening a grand ceremony takes place in the square. All persons connected with the government, after attending church service, assemble in front of the residence of the chief executive where they arrange themselves in line. The executive then passes along from right to left and embraces each, giving him the kiss of peace.

In Rome the principal ceremony is the high mass with Papal benediction at St. Peter's. The day is ushered in by the firing of cannons from the castle of St. Angelo, and by seven o'clock the carriages of ladies and gentlemen begin to make their way towards the cathedral. Seated in his chair of state, the Pope is borne from an adjoining hall of the Vatican, attired in the most splendid vestments. On his head he wears the tiara, a tall, round, gilded cap representing the "triple crown," temporal power, spiritual power, and the union of both, and by his side are borne large fans of ostrich feathers interspersed with peacock "eyes," these latter to symbolize the watchful eye of the church, and above him is a silken canopy. After officiating at the mass at the high altar, the Pope is borne with the same ceremony back through the church to the central doorway, there, arising from his chair, and surrounded by his principal officers, the benediction is given. In the evening the dome and external part of St. Peter's are beautifully illuminated and there is a display of fireworks.

The Lesson of The Hour

The downfall of conspicuous criminals in political and commercial life brings home to young men a wholesome lesson. A short time ago there were thousands of young men in this city viewing with an eager curious gaze the careers which have terminated and are terminating so tragically. It was a question in many minds whether honesty was the best policy, whether rectitude was profitable—whether, after all, the rascality which receives magnificent rewards was not the wisest form of activity for a young man cherishing a desire for wealth and power. Who can measure the effects of these pernicious examples on young men? It is well now to call popular attention to the fact that it has been demonstrated that rascality is a most precarious occupation and that howsoever infrequently it receives its just deserts, its advantages are more than offset by its hazards. Honesty is the best policy. A good conscience is preferable to power and pelf. When a man sacrifices personal probity and honor he incapacitates himself from enjoying the sweets of existence. Our corrupt officials bought their creature comforts at an exorbitant price, and in their gayest moments they were ever mindful of the fact that the world they lived in was unsubstantial; they expected and constantly dreaded the day of discovery and retribution.

An Unwarranted Spirit

While we feel that the storm which has wrecked these men has cleared the sky, that the air is purer and has tone and inspiration in it, and while we feel that much good will result from the punishment of every rogue that had a hand in the debauchment of this city we are inclined to admonish upon the vindictive spirit which appears to have been generated by the confessions of the bribe-takers. We can conceive of circumstances in which it would be quite natural for a community to feel vindictive toward boodling officials who had boodled a city into the piteous plight to which San Francisco has fallen; we can conceive of circumstances in which it would be most reasonable for a community to feel vindictive toward rich rogues who had hired corrupt officials to betray their sacred trust; but the case of San Francisco is one that, in our opinion, calls for contrition, for humiliation, for a firm purpose to amend—for any thing but vindictiveness. We do not know whether it is moral poverty or intellectual nudity that is responsible for our calm, dispassionate view of the situation, but whatever be the nature of the obliquity it is certain we experience no buoyant thrill of enthusiasm over the progress of Mr. Heney's hunt for evidence against the corporation rogues whose imprisonment is a consummation most devoutly wished by some of our contemporaries.

The Worship of Ruef

Perhaps this abnormal temperature of ours is due to the fact that we recognize in the pack that is yelping at the heels of the unconvicted corporation felons the familiar faces of certain individuals who were at one time giving aid and comfort to the forces of indecency that were so recently shattered. Perhaps it is because of this recognition that we now hazard diffidently the suggestion that those persons who, for selfish reasons, contributed steadily to the growth of Abe Ruef's power, pretending to be unaware of his iniquities, are far worse than the corporation crooks who are being pilloried in the press, upon whom obloquy is being heaped and who are being pictured as eloquent examples of human ignominy and degradation. Town Talk has been proclaiming Ruef a grafter since the first month of Mayor Schmitz's first term. And though we were alone for a long time in our attitude of hostility toward the Schmitz Administration we never for a moment harbored the hallucination that our complaisant contemporaries were in need of enlightenment. There was never any more doubt about Ruef's character than there is today about Gallagher's. It was known in every newspaper office in this city that he was as guilty as Jack Chretien of the crime of attempting to loot the Sullivan estate. It was known that he was a pettifogger without a conscience, unfit to associate with decent men, and it was known that he was openly bartering his influence as dictator of the Schmitz Administration. The fact is that this community as a whole was aware of the character of Abe Ruef. He surely made no effort to conceal the nature of his official relations with Schmitz when he extorted a half interest in a Market street theatre from its proprietor or when he manipulated the French restaurant deal. It would be absurd to deny that we knew he was a bad man—bold and shameless and vulgar in his badness—one with whom no gentleman could come in contact on terms of familiar intercourse without a sense of degradation. And yet how few were the citizens of this city that scorned to meet him! Nay, how few were they in the heyday of his power that were not flattered by his nod! Abe Ruef was a great man a little while ago. He had power in his hands, and patronage at his disposal and thousands came at his beck and went at his bidding. The power-worshipping multitude and the vulgar seekers for place hung around him with abject and obsequious fawning, and no intelligent man in this community was unaware of the imperative necessity of doing business with Abe preparatory to doing business with the city. Abe Ruef at liberty in San Francisco was in no uncongenial atmosphere. If, as Schopenhauer says, honor on its objective side, is other people's opinion of what we are worth, then Abe Ruef as boss of San Francisco was an honorable man; moreover his methods were sanctified by his usage and those people that acquiesced in them to the extent of paying the tribute that was exacted are underserving of our execration. Their conduct was in keeping with the spirit of the times and of the place. And though they violated both the moral and penal codes and should go to jail to serve as a wholesome example, it is not becoming in us to gloat over their predicament. Let us not give thanks to God that we who were tolerant of Ruef are not as the corporation publicans. Let us remember that every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled and that he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. When we wax wrathful toward the bribe-givers we exalt ourselves. If we are to be wrathful toward anybody let it be toward our shameless officials. For while we expected them to be bought it never occurred to us that they might not stay bought. The subtleties of perversion which they have mastered were never glimpsed by speculative minds.

Our Governor's Forbearance

Governor Gillett has just been engaged in the christian task of heaping coals of fire upon the heads of his enemies, but he has done it so unostentatiously that few have taken heed and none has given him the credit for a magnanimous exercise of his prerogative. The Governor has pocketed the measure raising the criminality of libel from misdemeanor to felony, so the libel law will remain as at present for two years more at least. This libel bill was the answer of the legislature to those editors who had excoriated its petty grafts, its subservience to corrupt influence and its neglect of those larger issues on which the eyes of the state were focused. Not satisfied with wreaking oratorical vengeance on their newspaper critics, the Sacramento lawmakers, early in the session, cast about for a more substantial form of revenge and found just what they wanted when their attention fell upon this measure which was framed to inspire outspoken editors with the fear of the penitentiary. The bill passed both houses of the legislature with a whoop, no effort being made to conceal the fact that it was a retaliatory attack on the hostile press of the state. Governor Gillett has had as much reason to resent the attitude of the newspapers up and down the state as the members of the legislature and the smarting solons undoubtedly counted on his signature to complete their revenge. But the Governor had already given proof in his treatment of various measures that broader considerations than personal spite actuated his policy and he disappointed expectation by burying the amendment to the libel law. It must be said that despite their systematic attacks upon him, not even the hostile newspaper proprietors entertained any fear that the libel bill would be signed; they gave Governor Gillett the credit for a liberality in this particular instance which they denied him in so many other matters. His forbearance in this case where a little vindictiveness would have been very, very human, however reprehensible, ought to earn for him greater consideration from the newspapers in the future.

Another Gillett Surprise

Governor Gillett's treatment of a number of measures passed up to his desk for consideration has been a great deal more surprising than his smothering of this libel bill. No emotion short of deep amazement can have been excited in the minds of the Republican party managers by his independent handling of bills on which the organization and anti-organization forces in the senate and assembly were most bitterly divided.

Contrary to all expectations the Governor seems to have studied these bills solely from the viewpoint of the best interests of the whole state and not at all with the idea of placating certain influences popularly credited with an influence as powerful as it is sinister upon the legislative and executive branches of the state government. No more signal instance of this has been given than his handling of the two anti-trust measures passed by the Legislature. One of these, called from its proposer, the Cartwright bill, was passed through both houses by clever strategy when the Republican party managers were napping. It is an excellent measure from the standpoint of the trust-buster, being neither more nor less than the famous Ohio anti-trust law under which more than a hundred indictments against the Standard Oil Company have already been secured. All the Democrats in the legislature supported it and there is no doubt that it would never have been passed if the Republican leaders had not been otherwise deeply engaged when it came up. There was an immediate rush to save the Governor from what the "wheel-horses" of the two houses thought would be the unpleasant necessity of repudiating anti-trust legislation by a veto of this bill. A measure introduced by Assemblyman Birdsall embodying the provisions of the ineffective Sherman anti-trust law was quickly dug out of its resting-place in the file, rushed through the Assembly and sent to the Upper House for passage. The fight waged against it in the senate by the champions of the Cartwright bill necessitated its amendment in the closing hours of the session, but by putting the clock back it was finally passed before adjournment and the organization men felt that they had saved the Governor from embarrassment by sending him a bill which he could sign without either offending the powerful corporations or exposing himself to the accusation of slighting anti-trust legislation. But in the face of these heroic efforts, with seeming indifference to the frenzied attempts of his supposed representatives in the Legislature to extricate him from an unpleasant situation, Governor Gillett has entirely ignored the innocuous Birdsall bill and has signed the Cartwright measure. If he considered at all the possibility of the Democrats making political capital out of the incident, even that has not deterred him from doing what he considered the best thing for the state. Evidently Gillett is not quite so subservient to the powers which are supposed to have placed him in the gubernatorial chair as many of his enemies would have us believe.

The Surgeon's Knife

The more familiar we become with the enthusiasms of medical scientists the deeper becomes the conviction that we have too much faith in doctors. Every little while we learn that the doctors have been acting on a theory that is entirely wrong, but it is scarcely abandoned before a new one is sprung, and then we again submit gracefully to experimental doses and operations until another authoritative halt is called in the interest of the species. Recently we were told of a drug that was used quite freely to cure influenza and which caused organic heart disease. We have also learned that the X-ray kills oftener than it cures, and that it is something of the true nature of which the medical profession is profoundly ignorant. Very soon after appendicitis was discovered to the medical world and fashionable society began flocking to the operating room some enthusiastic professionals advocated universal application of the knife, arguing that the vermiform appendix was the incarnation of innocuous desuetude, something that had served its purpose in the infant world and that survived through the ages without rhyme or reason. We were told that it was within the discretion of everybody to render life less precarious, and that the man who wouldn't separate himself from his vermiform appendix was in need of a guardian. But medical science has had another awakening. Though the function for which the imprecated appendix was designed is still unknown, the doctors have come to the conclusion that it was in the indulgence of no idle fancy that Nature attaches it to our persons. Cognizance has been taken of the fact that appendixless individuals are less robust than those that have not subjected themselves to the popular scientific emendation. It is also admitted now that in many instances doctors have confounded appendicitis, with the collywobbles and other minor complaints that are readily amenable to a dose of Jamaica ginger. It is high time to draw the line at indiscriminate amputations, to curtail the activities of the eager surgeon with his ever ready scalpel. Just as every pain below the belt line was diagnosed appendicitis, so every manifestation of innate devilishness has come to be attributed to "brain pressure," and in some of the eastern reformatories they have tried to improve temper with surgery. The doctors soberly announced their ability to transform little rowdies and thieves into earthly angels. Observation of some of the patients has caused a reversal of scientific attitude, and it is now admitted that incorrigibility cannot be traced to cranial bumps. But surgery is not to be discouraged by repeated explosions of new-fangled theories. Until public sentiment shall have become prejudiced against the scientific butcher the operating room will continue to be the doctors favorite theatre of action. There is less money in pills than there is in the knife; therein lies the secret of the dominant inclination of the medical profession.

Socialistic Colonies

As socialistic colonies always come to grief Upton Sinclair should not seriously mourn the destruction by fire of his co-operative establishment. From Brook Farm and Topolobampo to Bellamy and Kameah the experience was always the same—dissatisfaction, lawsuits, bankruptcy and disruption. There are sincere experimentalists who cast in all they have and invariably there are swindlers who enrich themselves. The fault lies not in the weakness of co-operation as an abstract principle but in the fact that the people do not co-operate. When Bronson Alcott conducted his enterprise at Concord, his daughter Louise records, there was never imperative work to be done—a hay crop to be got in before the storm, or an apple harvest to be gathered or anything else which ceased to be amusing and took on the stern aspect of a monotonous task—but that the spirit would move the sturdy ones to commune with nature or go on a talking tour, and Mrs. Alcott and the children had to kilt up their skirts and take hold. Some colonies are successful, such, for example as the Shaker communities, the Zionites, under the leadership of Dowie, and the Brotherhood at Point Loma, where Mrs. Tingley holds sway, but there is no co-operation in the socialistic sense in the government of any of them. On the contrary, there has been one powerful leader, an autocrat who brooks no criticism and requires strict obedience without a shadow of the latitude of private judgment in the subordinates. No chances are taken on a divided house and it takes a superhumanly powerful faction to effect a successful revolution. Co-operation pre-supposes the subordination of private whims and personal desires to the general good, and it is just the innate perversity of womankind which wrecks every scheme for co-operative housekeeping or management of business enterprises. The Sinclair enterprise has been in existence only a little over four months, and could hardly be said to have had a fair trial, yet the end was inevitable in four months, four years or four decades.

After Heine

By Rennell Rodd

Beautiful fisherman's daughter,
Steer in your bark to the land!
Come down to me over the water
And talk to me hand in hand!
Lay here on my heart those tresses
For look what have you to fear
Who are bold with the sea's caresses
Every day in the year?
My heart is at one with the deep
In its storm, in its ebb and flow.
And ah! There are pearls asleep
In cavernous depths below.

New Building Methods

By R. L. Taylor

Since the April fire some remarkable achievements in the building industry have been witnessed in this city. We have seen buildings pushed to completion in less time than it formerly took to construct a foundation, for in the days before the fire our building contractors were a lackadaisical lot. They spent months in grading for a foundation and it seemed as though they never thought of ordering their structural material until the site had been made ready for the work of construction. There were never any signs of hurry on a building job. It seemed to be a maxim of the business that the fewer the mechanics employed the more satisfactory would be the progress made. And every little while all work would cease, and then it would be learned that a strike had occurred and that differences were being adjusted. The James Flood Building, the St. Francis and the Fairmont were fine object lessons in the slow but sure policy of the building industry prior to April, 1906. Great has been the change that has taken place in the last five or six months. It was when we were basing our calculations on the old policy that we estimated that the city would be rebuilt in twenty years. Now we are of the opinion that in five years none of the scars of the fire will be visible.

We first learned of the potentialities for speed in the building industry when we saw how things were being done at the southwest corner of Fourth and Market streets. The spectacle of a large force of mechanics working by electric light caused many of us to pause and wonder whether we were mistaken about the time. It was there that the new and progressive system was first put in operation by the American-Pacific Construction Company. This is not, as many have surmised, an Eastern corporation that came across the continent to amaze us with the new methods that are characteristic of the Yankee hustler. It is a purely local company which was organized after the fire by Alfred L. Meyerstein, John S. Drum and William F. Humphrey of this city and Thomas Vigus, formerly of Los Angeles. It was organized for the purpose of doing a general contracting and engineering business and it is now the most complete and best equipped institution of the kind west of Chicago. The engineering corps is composed of the men who had charge of the work of constructing the Wentworth, the Auditorium and the Hayward Buildings of Los Angeles. In Los Angeles, by the way, greater strides have been made in the reinforced concrete branch of the building industry than in any other city in the world, and the men employed by the American-Pacific company are the men to whom the credit is due for the notable achievements of builders in the southern city.

To get an adequate idea of the equipment of the American-Pacific Construction Company one must visit its plant at Seventh and Townsend streets, where it occupies the greater part of a block. That block was formerly the site of the American Can Company, and after the fire it was a huge mass of debris. It was estimated that it could not be cleared inside of eight months. Manager Vigus put it in condition for occupancy and erected an immense warehouse, a mill, lumber sheds and offices inside of nine weeks.

At Seventh and Townsend streets the American-Pacific Company does all its own mill work, both for the inside and outside of buildings of any magnitude. The plant includes machinery for twisting steel and derricks for handling structural steel. There is a spur track of the Southern Pacific Company alongside the yards and warehouse and all kinds of structural material are lifted from the cars into the trucks of the building company. And this company, by the way, deals in structural material. It supplies the local market with lime, in which material there has been a famine. The famine was anticipated by Manager Vigus and as a consequence there is no shortage at the works of the American-Pacific Company. The warehouse is filled with cement and the yards are filled with lumber and all the structural steel that is needed this company has ready to hand.

In the circumstances it is not strange that the American-Pacific Company has some of the finest building contracts in town. In addition to the big reinforced concrete structure at Fourth and Market streets, it has the contract for the new Bullock & Jones building at Post and Kearny, the contract for the James Flood steel structure of six stories on the site of the old Grand Opera House, the contract for the reinforced concrete building at the gore of Ellis and Market upon which work was started last week and the contract for supplying the structural steel for the new Columbia Theatre at Geary and Van Ness. And this company is not through bidding yet. With its immense equipment there is no limit to the work that it is prepared to undertake, and with the confidence that the record of its engineering corps inspires it is bound to play a most important part in the reconstruction of San Francisco.

Milan and the Muse of Anacreon

By Herman Scheffauer

On a Sunday morning I reach Milan, after passing through the cheerful villages of the plains of Lombardy. This splendid and prosperous city, of old so vexed by war, so often despoiled by change of masters, now blooms and thrives under the secular rule of a unified Italy. It arose out of the ruins in which Barbarossa had laid it in 1162, then suffered continually from other powerful German emperors, and from 1714 until 1859 it sparkled in the crown of victorious Austria. But now the patriotic dreams of Mazzini and Cavour are realized and Italy stands powerful and free.

The majestic cathedral here is regarded by the Milanese as the eighth wonder of the world. A wonderful fabric it is, radiant in beauty and impressive in size. It is built entirely of the purest white marble, which neither time nor climate has discolored. A snowy forest of delicate pinnacles and spires glitters to the sky,—the very slabs of the roof are of marble. It seems as insubstantial as though it had been reared in some miraculous snow-storm whose flying flakes had piled themselves into forms of perfect loveliness under the spell of some vast Aeolean harmony that froze them eternally fast. Might I but at present recall the lines wherein Tennyson has glorified the Duomo of

Milan! Mounting high within the graceful central spire, one beholds the city prostrate in adoration far below, as it were in ashes and gray sack-cloth, while brightly all about, topping the chaste and carven finials and frosted spires, shines a celestial company of angels, warriors and saints,—white against the sky. Within the church, contrasted with the pearly splendor without, all is as night. Heavy twilight lurks in the aisles and under the arches, pierced by the red stars or the little tongues of candle-flames or haunted by the unlighted tapers which shimmer pallidly in the shade like ghosts. The color-masses and decorations are dramatic, all is dramatic, even to the sharp shaft of sunlight that smites the baldachin above the pulpit. Everywhere a marvellous craft and studied artistry is evident. This swooning, mystic sombreness, this theatricality so rich, so impressive, so packed with awe, these swarming echoes of the past and these organ-raptures interwoven with the sensuous censer-smoke,—admirably do they fulfil their purpose in the splendid dramaturgy of Creed. The facade of this wonderful work is not pure in style, for the exquisite Italian Gothic is mixed strangely yet not inharmoniously with details of the Renaissance. There is a beautiful cemetery in Milan with rare monuments by modern artists, and, remarkably enough, there is a crematory too. It appears that the Italians are more solicitous as to how the dead are housed or kept warm than the living. In the church of S. Maria della Grazie is the famous Last Supper of Leonardo da Vinci, sadly wrecked. The sublime fresco of the great master is quite obliterated and what is left is fast fading away. With a sigh I realized that I was one of the last to feast my eyes upon The Last Supper. Aside from the sentiment with which we reverently regard the original, lamentation in this case, where so many excellent copies exist, is not justified. But sentiment is everything. One day some years ago, while still faithful to the Muse of Architecture, after idly striking random circles with my compasses and dreaming of the pilgrimage to be, I wrote down the following straying thought:

"A man whose life is established in one place and in one daily round is like a point circling about a fixed center, its course tangent, perhaps, with other circles, but displacing neither them nor itself; a man who travels is like that imaginary circling point still revolving, but also endowed with the additional motion of progression into a mass of other circles, fixed or errant, touching them or intersecting them, that is to say, the lives and experiences of other men."

Thus might it be demonstrated geometrically how, in the nature of things, accidents, adventures and encounters more frequently beset the traveler's path than they do his who stays at home. When one is young, amid new scenes, a-thirst with a desire to know all things, to peer into every place and let the vast and various externality of the living world impress its forms upon one, when one wanders, always alone, from city to city, then, almost without search, does circumstance pave the way for many events. And most is this true when one errs idly about in that untrammelled land of love and light and art which is Italy. So it was natural and logical and fatefully inevitable that I, who had met with so many folk of all sorts in many places, should likewise meet with

San Francisco

By Mabel Porter Pitts

Something hast thou tempting, luring,
 Something of that charm enduring
 Near divine;
 Something vague and yet compelling
 From a thousand hills comes welling,
 Thy delights but faintly telling,
 Mistress mine.

Morn and midday show those graces
 That the night in sea-loomed laces
 Round thee spreads;
 Stars o'erhead all blur and spangle
 And, like furbelow and bangle,
 Thine own winking lights entangle
 In the threads.

Like that Helen, famed in story,
 Blessing, blighting with her glory
 Son and sire,
 So art thou; and each his greeting
 Gives from loyal bosom beating,
 In thy soft endearments meeting
 His desire.

Perspective Impressions

Ruef thinks that he is being subjected to unusual punishment. So was the city for awhile.

If we are having government by indictment why doesn't Langdon close the Davis death trap?

Strikes and rumors of strikes are once more assuring us of prosperity in the industrial world.

"Incompatibility of temperament" is alleged as the cause of the expulsion of a member of a Berkeley sorority. It appears that she has so much more sense than any of the other members of the sorority that she is not a congenial companion.

"Close the Davis death trap," says the Call. That should be easy if the supervisors are really good dogs.

Modest Mr. Gallagher

Who was it that pioneered the way to absolution for the gentlemen that have been sharing with Ruef the wages of Cypria and the loot of crime? I know that the great achievement is generally attributed to Lonergan, but to me it has been hinted that in the cenotaph to be reared in commemoration of the event will be chiseled the name of Gallagher. Far be it from me, however, to extinguish those tapers of glory that for Lonergan flare. Hints are not always to be relied upon, and anyway I am not so partial to Gallagher as to be eager to enrich him with spoils from the brow of the erstwhile bakery-wagon driver. And to Gallagher's credit be it said he is not in the slightest degree envious. On the contrary he is quite willing that the gentleman who played a subordinate role in the carnival of graft should enjoy undisputed the distinction which the dailies have thrust upon him. But I fear that when the thrilling history of these stirring times comes to be written, with Detective Burns at the elbow of the historian, the emaciated figure of that meagre mortal Lonergan will shrink into insignificance within the penumbra of the effulgent head groom of the Augean Stable. But Head Groom Gallagher, who, in the worst confusion emerges, cork-like, unsunk, is above all things a modest man in the sense that he never obtrudes his Machiavellian accomplishments. The only other quality in him comparable with this virtue is his thrift. It was Gallagher, be it remembered, who exacted compensation from each of his associates for distributing the swag. But this man of obscene greed, when it comes to bearing the blushing honors that belong to the first of the informers is like unto the shrinking violet.

The Cautious Lonergan

Whatever the facts may be the story that with the sorcery of his art Burns contrived to fascinate Gallagher, and that the subsequent trapping of Lonergan and Walsh was schemed in the brain of the Head Groom, is not lacking in verisimilitude. It is explained that Lonergan and Walsh were trapped because of the magnanimity of Gallagher who had no desire to claim the credit for negotiating the terms of State's evidence. And Lonergan himself, by the way, fought shy of the opportunity to win that credit. But the shyness of Lonergan is not to be attributed to his modesty. Mr. Lonergan is not of the Gallagher temperament. Indeed Mr. Lonergan is in a class by himself. When trapped he was as stubborn as a mule with prejudices against the driver. Though caught with the money in his hands he protested his innocence unwaveringly for hours on a stretch. It was not until Burns divined his thoughts that he "came through."

"Of course we don't want the money," said Burns.

"You don't?" asked Lonergan in amazement.

"Why of course not," said Burns; the money doesn't belong to the people."

"An' you wouldn't take it if you knew where it was?" he eagerly asked.

"Certainly not" was the reply.

"Not even if I had it here on me person?"

"Not if you had it in your hand," said Burns.

"Then I'll give up," said Lonergan.

And he did.

His Terrible Conscience

Lonergan is a man with a conscience, a fact to which he invited attention before the Grand Jury. He explained that after taking a bribe from the Home Telephone Company his inward monitor chided him for his infidelity to the Pacific States Company and to soothe his virtuous mind he returned half the bribe. He sewed the other half up in his mattress and it went up in the smoke of the April fire, after which relentless remorse poured gall into the bitter cup of his great regret at not having returned the whole sum. Lonergan is a man of unique personality but there are others. Walsh is another. When Walsh was trapped he had a jag on and he was inaccessible to persuasion. He was locked up in a room to sober off and throughout the night he kept repeating in a doleful tone: "This is a nice way to treat an honest man." In the morning Lonergan's type-written confession was read to him and he was advised to make a statement but he stoutly maintained that he had no confession to make. Presently Heney entered the room.

"Won't he confess," asked the attorney.

"No," said Burns; "and I've just been reading Lonergan's confession to him."

"Oh, don't bother with him," said Heney; "he wouldn't confess if you read the other six to him."

Walsh's eyes popped out. "Have you got six more?" he asked.

"That's what we have," said Burns without batting an eyelash, and Walsh couldn't get aboard fast enough.

Buoyant Rogues at Liberty

There is only one distressing circumstance about the confession of the supervisors and that is that it secured their liberty and embarrassed a lot of good fellows who did only what the enlightened experience of the day considered to be necessary. The enlightened experience of the day is a treacherous guide. It is the unenlightened experience of the past that we should have for guide because the consequences are all charted out. Piteous is the plight the bribe-givers are in, while the supervisors have not even a regret save that the graft is at an end. The supervisors never had morals enough to hurt and their sense of shame is a negligible quantity. They have explored depths of iniquity that to measure were as futile as to etch a discord or paint an odor and yet there is still a plentitude of roses bordering their pathway through life. They are neither to be barred out from the large possibilities of a life of luxury nor restricted to the meagre prospects of irksome virtue. They are even now flaunting themselves in public places, all but Lonergan complaining of only one thing—that Lonergan "peached." Exposure has had no depressing effect on their spirits. The past has become no hindrance or burden to them. They had a few bad quarter hours with the Grand Jury and that was all. They are around once more invigorating their energies with the juice of the grape, while the men whose money they are squandering are in aguish mood of cold terror, the prospect before them filling them, their friends and families with sore distress. Strange happenings, these!

Schmitz's Treasure Box

The newspapers, quick to make any point against Mayor Schmitz and his associates, have not neglected the opportunity afforded by the discovery in his old bedroom of a cunningly hidden coffer which may or may not have been constructed for the purpose of receiving the tainted profits of municipal corruption. No sooner had the eagle eye of William J. Burns pierced the secret of the plush-lined hole in the floor than the fact of its existence was trumpeted to the world as another evidence of the venality and miser-like avarice of our indicted chief executive. Photographs and diagrams with crosses to mark the precise location of this treasure cache have placed the proof of its existence beyond the possibility of cavil, while cartoons and satirical articles have impressed upon the vulgar mind the full meaning of this latest manifestation of the Mayor's hoarding propensities. In the slang of the local room it is a "crackerjack story" and it has been so skillfully handled that its plausibility is almost perfect. As a matter of fact, however, there is no reason why an innocent explanation of the existence of this secret coffer should not be the correct one. It is by no means uncommon for citizens who have no thought of hiding dishonest gains to have caches of exactly this kind constructed in their homes for the purpose of safeguarding their silverware and jewelry. There is no improbability in supposing that Schmitz had this little cabinet built before his sudden affluence impressed upon his mind the advisability of renting a safe deposit box. It is a poor carpenter who is not frequently called upon by fearful housewives to rip a few planks out of a floor or cut a hole in a wall to make a safe depository for the family valuables. This obvious fact has been cunningly concealed by the newspapers and that hole in the floor is now regarded as conclusive proof of the Mayor's guilt. With the known limitations of the popular mind it is not strange that this discovery should have more weight in damning the Mayor than a hundred indictments. Such caches are closely connected in the vulgar imagination with guilt, midnight and mystery, and the newspapers have carefully played upon this association of ideas. In reality the fact that Schmitz considered such a secret receptacle necessary is an indictment, not of his honesty but of police efficiency. So it is an indirect reflection on the Administration anyway.

The Harrying of Pillsbury

Mr. Evan S. Pillsbury is represented to have been in no amiable mood during his interview with Mr. Francis Heney before the Grand Jury last week. I can readily account for Mr. Pillsbury's somewhat inflammatory conduct on that occasion. Mr. Pillsbury under the compulsion exerted by this particular jury for the facilitation of such inquiry as Mr. Heney might be disposed to make, experienced emotions very much akin to those that agitate a helpless, caged animal when harried by a cruel tormentor. No disparagement of Mr. Pillsbury is intended by this simile. I have fashioned it because it fits his case. Mr. Pillsbury and Mr. Heney are bitter enemies. Their hatred of each other has extended over a long period. It first found expression during the trial of Judge Noyes, the impeached Nome jurist, in the Federal courts. Heney defended Noyes and Pillsbury was on the other side. The acrimonies of that trial were many and long drawn out, and when, some months after it was over, Heney was an applicant for membership to the Pacific Union Club and there was opposition, he suspected that it was inspired by Mr. Pillsbury. But Heney was admitted to membership and doubtless Mr. Pillsbury was disgusted. So the probability is that Heney entered upon the interrogation of Mr. Pillsbury before the Grand Jury with more delight than he had previously experienced during the whole course of the graft investigation. And poor Pillsbury! Fancy his chagrin and rage at being thus compelled to submit to the goads of his enemy.

Berkeley's Newest Project

The people of Berkeley are living in an epoch of expansion; likewise an epoch of absorption. There is a movement of ideas in Berkeley and there is no telling where it will end. There is no limit to the ambition of the people of Berkeley. It is not enough for them to have the State University and the State Capitol and the Hillside Club; to boast a burg that is at once the centre of state politics and the seat of culture: they must also have in their midst the nursery of the dramatic, histrionic and operatic arts. This latest design of the good people of Berkeley has been disclosed by the Oakland Tribune. According to that veracious journal it is the purpose of Berkeley to "unearth and stimulate undeveloped talent" through the medium of a theatre to be devoted to the operatic and dramatic arts. The names of the patrons and patronesses are not to be disclosed for awhile. Meanwhile they will conduct a vast correspondence with a view to rounding up all the most suitable talent in the estate. Presently they will launch the organization, under the auspices of which an effort will be made "to educate the theatre-going public," by presenting plays that "do not appeal to the popular taste." The company will consist of "the leading professionals of the West." There will be amateurs in the company but they shall have to have "equal ability with the professionals." It is "the ultimate intention to make Berkeley the Athens of America, the place where only the finest dramatic and musical events take place." The men and women behind this grand and glorious project are now "in communication with George Bernard Shaw and hope to be able to announce soon that he will write a play for them." This is important, but somewhat less significant than the announcement that "a play is now being written for them by a young Western playwright, or the equally interesting announcement that, "Whenever it is possible the organization intends to use original plays by California authors." That the organization is to be substantially inspired we may infer from the circumstance that "Professor William D. Armes and the English Department of the University are to co-operate with the organization in giving the plays."

Triumph Inevitable

It is a pleasure to take up this stupendous, beneficent Berkeley project for equanimous consideration. Far be it from me to assume the attitude of one intent upon winnowing the chaff from the grains of wisdom that have sprung up in the cultured soil of the University town. For I am no canny cynic inclined to view the prospect with irreverence. On the contrary, in this instance I am in a most optimistic mood. The prepotency of the prime agency to be employed, in my opinion, makes triumph inevitable. There is nothing like culture to conjure with, especially on the shores of our beautiful bay. And this new temple of art, this Berkeley shrine of the muses is to have Culture with a big C engraved on the corner stone and sculptured in signs symbolic over the entrance. The walls will fairly reek of culture and the news will be widely disseminated that if one desires the hall-mark of culture one must attend the performances of the Berkeley Independent Stage Society. Great are the psychological marvels possible to the suggestion of culture on the shores of San Francisco bay, for here the nouveaux cultives abound. It will be necessary merely to inspire them with confidence in the esthetic supremacy of the Berkeley arbiters of the stage to make the way clear for the exploitation of the triumphs of Californian genius. And with Professor Armes and the whole English Department of the University behind the institution, the inspiration will be easy. So let us get ready to acclaim the self-constituted mentors of the drama, the nurses of the native muses, the guides to the ways of sweetness and light. They cannot lose.

The Appeal to Shaw

The rise of the suburban theatre into artistic importance is a phenomenon that I will welcome with great enthusiasm and with absolute confidence in one thing—its success from the standpoint of patronage. Of its artistic success I am not prepared to prognosticate, being in ignorance of the personalities behind the project. Professor Armes's connection with it is a guarantee of a happy commingling of tripping speech and precise rhetoric, but whether we shall see trooping to the front dramatists who are masters of sparkling utterance and profound thought is something of which I am by no means unduly sanguine. There may be in this state innumerable mute inglorious Scribes, Sardous, Ibsens, Sheridans, Molières and Echegarays, needing nothing more than the open door of a temple of art to move them to choice utterances; such a temple as is to be founded by the best wits of Berkeley, to be winged and towered by the nicest tastes of the Academic grove and sculptured and colored by the genius of the most cultured professors of our great institution of learning. That George Bernard Shaw will consent to write a play for these patrons of the drama I seriously doubt. George is a sceptical chap and will be very likely to suspect the Berkeley promoters of art of performing awkward and ludicrous antics on the front-door steps of culture. The very fact of their having invited him, a professional playwright, to write a play for an unknown society, will be interpreted by him as a mark of unsophistication entirely inconsistent with the idea of fitness for the task of elevating the stage. So he will be very likely either to tell them to go to or ask them where in the vast nether regions is the exact location of Berkeley.

A. Chance For Harris

But the people of Berkeley can afford to scorn Shaw if their main purpose is to develop home talent. I harbor the notion that with their encouragement the native drama will soon spring forth in the glorious blossoms that adorn the stage of the great literary centres of the old world. I suspect that we have in our midst many young playwrights prepared to wing their way at a single flight into the central blue of the theatrical firmament and I am confident that Elmer Harris will seize the tail-feathers of this golden opportunity to make good. Mr. Harris is a native dramatist who went to Europe to win his spurs. Returning home he was the herald of his own foreign triumphs. We learned from him that he had written a play in German that had won a prize in Germany. I confidently expected him to translate it into his mother tongue for home consumption, but for some reason he refrained and took to lecturing to the Higher Culturists across the bay on Ibsen and kindred topics. He also spent a brief season promoting the drama through the medium of an Independent Theatre society across the bay, but never once that I know of did he exploit one of his own plays. Yet he is a dramatist. When last heard from he was collaborating on a play with a distinguished lady novelist in Monterey. I am eager to see one of his plays, a child of his unassisted genius, but in default thereof I will be satisfied with the product of collaboration. Perhaps this is the play that is in process of construction for the Berkeley temple. Or perhaps the glad expectations justified by Mr. Harris's impending parturition are the inspiration of the future home of the dramatic muse, for Mr. Harris is held in very high esteem in Berkeley. He is a prophet with loads of honor in his own home, and I have no doubt that he deserves it. But whether or not he comes through with a play, whether or not he puts over a dramatic masterpiece, the temple will be reared, and then will come "plays that do not appeal to the popular taste," plays up to which the popular taste is to be educated. No inconsiderable boon this that Berkeley is to confer upon us; one that should be hailed by the hitherto unrecognized dramatists who have not come into their own simply and merely because of the non-existence of a theatre devoted to the exploitation of plays that do not appeal to the popular taste.

That Sorority Rumpus

The tempest in the campus teapot which has been raised by the summary dismissal of Isabel McReynolds from the Delta Delta Delta sorority will probably splash over and scald sororities in general. The High School "frat" is in general disrepute but the most vehement enemy of these undergraduate societies has never accused the college sororities of the feline propensities which the "Tri Delt" girls have shown. Contrast the attitude of the California club women toward Mrs. Schiller of unsavory divorce notoriety. A sorority, as its very name implies, binds its members by ties of sisterly love and fealty whereas a club is committed to a cause not bound to personal allegiance. Yet when the California Club was dragged into the case and prominent members were called to testify concerning Mrs. Schiller's connection with the organization these women were careful to testify like "gentlemen"—not one of them indulged in a single comment at Mrs. Schiller's expense.

It Was Unprecedented

Miss McReynolds is not a parallel type. She has been accused of no wrongdoing, but her "sorority sisters," who do not wear their claws close clipped, were sweetly careful to make public the fact that she had been expelled from their organization. Only people in touch with college life realize what a drastic measure the "Tri Delt" took when they expelled a member. In the whole history of secret societies at the State University, there is record of but one man who had his Greek letter pin taken away from him. His fraternity brothers were convinced that he was guilty of forgery and they made good his defalcations and hushed the matter up. The youth suddenly dropped out of college, his name was erased from the fraternity roster but so quietly was the matter accomplished that not a dozen people outside of his fraternity knew the real reason why his college career was abruptly discontinued.

The Reason Why

An intimate friend of Miss McReynolds tells me that incompatibility of temperament is really the only reason for the "Tri Delt" action. One hears diverse theories suggested as pegs to hang justifiable pretexts on, but they are puerile. The simple fact is that Miss McReynolds has the "artistic temperament;" and that is something which prosaic young women who will probably shine in conventional society some day cannot understand. Miss McReynolds has lots of histrionic talent and she loves the stage and its ways, and some of the hopeless mediocrities of the sorority pretend to have been shocked because on one occasion she forgot to take off her make-up. The experience of Miss McReynolds at Berkeley is akin to that which Blanche Bates had in Presidio society. To those that know how sororities "rush" their members it seems remarkable that there are so few exposures of infelicitities. Girls that are believed to have wealth or that have social prominence are zealously solicited by the sorority rushers and as no measuring stick of character is ever used the wonder is that closer intimacy does not develop more misfits.

The Smashing of Van Fleet

The California delegation having recommended Judge Van Fleet for the new Federal judgeship it is curious that nobody has seen fit to spring that old familiar story of the decision rendered by him when he was one of the Supreme Court justices. Its value for campaign purposes was demonstrated several years ago, for in consequence of its strategic dissemination and industrious repetition Judge Van Fleet suffered defeat at the polls. And what a cruel piece of injustice that was! Throughout this state Justice Van Fleet was held up to public contempt as an iniquitous jurist for having rendered an infamous decision in which it was held that the life of a poor man's son was of less value than the life of a rich man's son. It were unquestionably a most reprehensible perversion of the law for a judge to differentiate a poor from a rich man in his appraisal of human life, but that is not what Judge Van Fleet did. Nevertheless it was what his newspaper detractors said he did. Moreover it was what his newspaper detractors persuaded many thousands of the voters of this state that he did. And the probability is that many thousands of the voters of this state still believe that Judge Van Fleet is deserving of reprobation for having made that invidious distinction. Yet he did nothing more than affirm a principle of law that is generally recognized by the courts not only of this country but of Europe. The case was one in which a man sued for damages for the death of his son. Now the law does not recognize a parent's sentimental interest in a child. The child, under the law, is entirely of pecuniary value, and when, for example, a boy is killed in a railroad accident, the estimate of his value must be based entirely upon his earning capacity. But it is impossible to say what is likely to be the earning capacity of a youth who has not yet started upon his industrial career. He may be destined for a captaincy in the industrial world, but it is also quite possible that he may never rise above the rank and file. To have some fixed principle upon which to appraise damages the courts long ago decided to assume that a boy would not be likely to excel his father as a wage-earner. That was the principle which guided Justice Van Fleet and in which his associates concurred, and it happened that the father in the case was a mechanic. It was a case that offered fine material out of which to fashion the kind of campaign abuse that appeals to the superior intelligence of the dear people.

A Worthy Project

Efforts are being made to widen the scope of the work done by the Lion Memorial Home of Alameda, and to establish a hospital to be supported to a great extent by public subscription. The Home heretofore has occupied small quarters, and the managers have interested themselves chiefly in looking after women and girls who are destitute or out of work, and sheltering them until they could be in some way provided for. A good many members at a dollar a month each have been secured, but it has been found that the work done does not cover the field. For that reason it is intended if the money can be raised to secure larger quarters where a hospital also will be maintained. As has been the case in the past, those who can afford to will pay for treatment or accommodations received. It is thought that a sufficient number of members can be obtained to assure the success of the hospital project.

The Captain Was Rattled

Jack London's little vessel, the Snark, which for many moons has been about to start upon her seven years' journey around the world, is still on the verge of departure. She may come back, but, without wishing to utter a word that might be interpreted as discouraging, I must say that I "hae me doots." Until one morning last week I had taken it for granted that perfect safety would attend the journey. I knew nothing of the personality of the man who is to navigate the Snark to fame, but was told that he was one Roscoe Eames, a relative by marriage of the adventurous London. "If he is a navigator he must be a sailor," I thought. It was because of the interest that I took in the going forth of the Snark that I observed her while on a recent journey across the bay. Captain Eames was in command of the Snark and was evidently getting her accustomed to the feel of the water. Just as we were within hailing distance things began to happen. Captain Eames, dodging across the bow of one ferry boat, dodged under the bow of the other. The tide was strong, the wind was high, the waves rolled threateningly, and the Snark began to have fits. Captain Eames jumped up and began to wave his arms, uttering commands in a hoarse voice. Being no mariner myself, I could not understand all he said, but I caught a few such expressions as "Luff the piston rod," "Weather the port bow," "Man the life-preservers" and "What will Jack say?" It was a perilous moment. The commuters held their breath in horror. The Snark advanced and retreated, backed and filled, and finally worked out of her perilous position. But it filled my soul with misgivings. I don't believe that Captain Eames is a real for-true navigator. What would happen if he ran into such a bunch of trouble about half way between here and Tahiti, with no ferry-boat deckhand waiting to throw him a needed line. At so great a distance from land ability to swim would be of no avail. Besides sharks have no respect for good swimmers.

Baker's Straight Talks

One of our Superior Judges has pronounced our Juvenile Court methods of little avail in turning young criminals into the right path. Over in Alameda they have something that beats the Juvenile Court all to pieces and vindicates the old saying about an ounce of prevention being worth a pound of cure. It is not an official affair, maintained by law, but it might be called a private enterprise for the good of the youth of the town. The head and front of it is J. E. Baker, a banker, whose methods are simple. Every Sunday evening he delivers a talk at the Presbyterian Church for the benefit of such boys as care to attend. His talks are on business success and morals. One might not think that boys would flock enthusiastically to hear a discourse on such topics; but the boys of Alameda do, and pronounce their preceptor a "peach." There is many a youngster of that town who will forego almost any pleasure for the sake of this lecture. Several of the boys have been asked why Mr. Baker is so popular with them, and invariably the reply is, "He doesn't preach." Boys do not like preaching, and Baker, realizing this, gives them straight talks on the material advantages of leading a moral life and of honesty in business. Success, of the legitimate sort, is often his topic, and he tells them of his own hard struggles to reach a position of prominence in the community. He tells them their duty toward their employers—also toward themselves. "No matter if you are dissatisfied with your job," he tells them, "do not leave it until you get another one." That piece of advice has become a maxim among the Alameda boys. These lectures, which have been kept up for years, have done a world of good in Alameda. They have started the boys to reflecting along lines not usually followed by the youthful mind, and have encouraged many a lad to start out in life with principles that have carried him to honest success. It is noticeable that the boys who attend these lectures are not of the "goody goody" class, but are healthy young animals who do not get brain-fag from overstudy, who are fond of athletics, and who would not hesitate to enter into a good set-to with bare fists in support of principle. One man of Baker's type in a community does more good than a dozen Juvenile Courts.

A Poet's Rebuke

My diminished head I bow in apologetic submission. Living in the suburbs as I have since last April, waiting patiently for the rents to fall, I have had much opportunity to feast upon landscape, and despite the almost unprecedented rainfall I have noted how sweet, when Winter long hath chilled the scene, buds cheerful Spring's first timid glimpse of green—herald of laughing Summer, life and light, promise fulfilled and satisfied delight. So I was moved last week gently to chide our tardy poets who have failed to pipe their seasonable lays. I asked them why they had failed to sing of the annual phenomena that accompany the movement of the sap and the preoccupation of young men's fancy with thoughts of love. One H. Schmidt has made reply. The name is not familiar. I have not come across his verse in any of the anthologies with which I am familiar, but that circumstance argues not the unimportance of his muse. Mr. H. Schmidt can jingle a rebuke with the best of 'em. Hear him:

Sweet Spring had come. The bard kept mum—
How did he know that Spring had come?
Now let me see: But yesterday
There reigned despair, ennui, dismay.
For weeks McAdie'd tried in vain
To put quietus on the rain.
With what effect? You know it, pard.
You would not walk across the yard,
And you sat down, and with your pen
You flogged the poet. In your den
You heard the hissing of the gale,
(You know that morning we had hail)
To you (excuse a little whack)
Of import is the almanac
But to the bard—perish the thought
To him the almanac is naught.
Kissed by the muse, Apollo sired,
A bard has got to be inspired;
Inspired by sun and flowers fair,
Not by the moisture in the air,
Inspired by stars and moonlight sweet
And not by hail and mud and sleet
The almanac!—perish the thought!
To him the almanac is naught.

More Lonergan Stories

I must revert to the grafters for belated stories are coming in every little while, stories of the aftermath of the confession and of incidents in the brief history of the unsavory gang of officials. One of the stories is of Tom Lonergan, and it is one that indicates that he is not such a fool as his fellow-grafters believe. After the story was published of the trapping of Lonergan the befrizzled blacksmith's helper, John J. Furey, donned his war paint and immediately hit the trail. "If you have told what the papers say you have," hissed the giant Furey, "we'll kill you as sure as you are here." "Jack Furey," returned Lonergan, undismayed if puny, "you take my advice and look after Jack Furey." And it seems Furey did, being one of the first to get a ticket for the immunity bath. Another raconteur relates that some weeks after the earthquake Lonergan came near causing a split in the board by trifling with the vanity of Pat McGushin, poet and boozologist. McGushin had inserted a tribute to a dead friend in the obituary column of a morning paper that contained a couplet of this fashion:

"We mourn the loss of John Joseph O'Reilly.

"None knew him but to esteem him most highly."

A few days later Lonergan met McGushin with the comment: "It was a fine pome that yez had in the papers—"

PERFORMANCE AND PRICE

Model G

$2000

It remained for the Cadillac Model G to convince discriminating motorists that a powerful, dependable, "thoroughbred" four-cylinder automobile, of high-grade construction and finish, could be built and sold at a price considerably less than the average touring car.

Model G represents more than mere money saving; in every detail it typifies really superior mechanical achievement, embodying features and improvements found only in the most expensive models.

Twenty horse power; direct shaft drive; wheel base, 100 inches; automatic ring type engine governor; new type muffler; transmission, selective type sliding gear of new design, eliminating crashing and grinding; direct drive on high speed with no gears in mesh. Your nearest dealer will gladly demonstrate Model G or any of the other Cadillac cars.

"I'm glad ye liked it," said McGushin.

"Yes," continued Lonergan, "it reminds me of 'Here lies the body of little Willy; he was hit by a car and it knocked him silly.'"

"Ye'll not insult me dead friends while I can help it," shouted the bristling McGushin, peeling his coat. And only the prompt interposition of by-standers forestalled the spectacle of a brace of elderly city fathers engaged in a mill in a public street.

Our Own "Brooke Farm"

Katherine Williams of this city, who has been a member of Upton Sinclair's colony at Englewood, has written friends that the members have voted not to rebuild Helicon Hall, the fire and its attendant tragedies having served as an extinguisher of communistic enthusiasm. Malicious Fate seems bent upon stirring such experiments with a big spoon and when the bubbles of discontent refuse to rise to the surface, as in the case of the Sinclair colony, a lighted match is set to the scheme. Although it is not generally known, Mrs. Jack London's girlhood home near Glen Ellen was originally a "Brooke Farm" experiment. Her aunt, Mrs. Eames, still lives at "Wake Robin Lodge," which was the main dwelling for the band of hopeful and earnest communists that foregathered there about fifteen years ago to gather "sweetness and light" in that charmed spot. One by one the colonists decided that "right living and clear thinking" did not flourish in a purer form under the Sequoia trees than elsewhere and the colony disbanded. Mrs. Eames's husband, Roscoe Eames, is scheduled to accompany the Jack Londons on that widely exploited yachting cruise which is postponed with the same unvarying regularity with which the waves make toward the pebbled shore. Mrs. London says she has eaten so many "positively farewell" dinners that she is accumulating flesh. London's literary endeavors are too remunerative to permit the insinuation that this deferred cruise is simply a clever way of evading a board bill but his friends are beginning to "josh" and the "Snark" will either have to set sail soon or the Londons' seafaring reputation will be drowned in a coruscating Niagara of jest and jibe.

The Maternity Benefit

The benefit for the San Francisco Maternity Hospital on Tuesday afternoon brought out a good sized audience of society people. Of course Mrs. Lowenberg's sketch was the principal feature, and it was a most enjoyable one. Miss Hilda Clough was a charming leading lady and Mme. Emilia Tojetti was very busy in a vivacious role. There was a "meeting" scene very life-like indeed. The ladies who met looked charming, refined and perfectly natural, and the way they stood round and pretended to chat and drink tea would have delighted the heart of a really, truly stage manager whose most difficult task is usually trying to make his mobs look real. Mrs. M. E. Deane's entrance among them evoked applause, as did that of Mrs. Lowenberg, the authoress of the sketch.

Of Local Interest

Constance Crimmins whose marriage to Mr. Childs occurred this week is the sister of Captain Crimmins who married Miss Cole. The Crimmins family is not of the smartest set of New York, but its members are very highly respected. Katherine McCann who acted as one of the bridesmaids is well known in this city. She is an intimate friend of Mrs. Fred Kohl whom she visited in this city three seasons ago. Anita Harvey and Florence Cole were both bridesmaids of Miss Constance.

Mrs. Peter Will Not Come

The Gusberettes have thrown around a lot of ink about Mrs. Peter Martin's determination to be present at the wedding of her husband's niece, Anita Harvey. According to the Bavardes Mrs. Peter would forego a dinner engagement with the King of England himself in order to assist at the ceremony. But a friend in Paris writes me that the fair Lily has no idea of coming to California this year. She has her sister Blanche with her in Paris and they are considered the most striking pair of young American women in the French capital. Birdie Fair Vanderbilt is a frequent third which proves that Herman Oelrich's will has not made a rift in the family-in-law lute. In fact Mrs. Peter Martin, who has never been a great favorite with "Aunt Tessie," is said to fit more snugly in her graces now than ever. In view of the fact that Mrs. Peter's mother was one of the chief beneficiaries under the will that cut the wife out entirely this sudden friendship is considered rather remarkable.

As Anita Harvey is a very sensible girl without the social ambition cast in her eye she was probably not tearful over the fact that neither Mrs. Peter Martin nor her family were in New York while she was trousseau hunting. But Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who "sets great store" by the Oelrichs infusion into the Martin family, was disconsolate that there was no one to lead Anita into a plush lined seat in the sacred inner circle. The Crimmins family with whom Mrs. J. Downey Harvey and her daughter stayed in New York are muchly millioned but they do not move in as rarified a social atmosphere as the Oelrichs.

Our Budding Dramatist

Richard Watson Tully and his wife Eleanor Gates, I am informed by letter, are in Capri and are collaborating on a play. Richard is much encouraged by the success of "The Rose of the Rancho," which as "Juanita of San Juan" was decidedly amateurish, but which the deft hand of Dave Belasco transformed into a picturesque melodrama. It has been reported that Tully is receiving a thousand a month in royalties, but of course this is a pipe dream.

Mrs. Carolan's Pets

Those who scan the "Female Help" column were very much interested the other day in an advertisement for "a young woman who thoroughly understands the care of pet dogs." I have been wondering whether it was Mrs. Francis Carolan who inserted the "ad" for I know of no one else who keeps a special maid for her bow wows. Of course people who have kennels employ caretakers but the only house pets I know of that have the undivided care and attention of a maid are the luxury loving canines that go satin shod through the Carolan household. Mrs. Carolan has a sensitive feeling for color and her pets are always beribboned in a tone that blends with her own costume. When she came back from Europe she brought a whole trunkful of the latest smart accessories for a fashionable bow wow's wardrobe. The bolts of gorgeous ribbons which are used up on these fortunate canines would stock a ribbon department of a big store. Mrs. Carolan has them designed to match her morning gowns and when her brunette beauty is set off by pink, blue, or what not, the doggies show the same color scheme. As the same jaunty bow never graces their aristocratic necks twice it takes miles of ribbon to keep them immaculately bedecked the year around. At the end of each day the ribbons, and there are usually two changes a day, are burned. Who would object "going to the dogs" if it represented the state of velvet ease which these bow wows enjoy?

Burlingame's Latest Problem

Burlingame society is very much alive to the fact that "Dick" McCreery is going to bring his bride, the erstwhile Lady Grey Egerton, for a short visit to these parts. What's bothering Blingum is just what sort of a welcome ought to be put into cold storage for use during Mrs. McCreery's visit. In London society is inclined to feel sorry for Sir Philip Egerton, the divorced husband of the present Mrs. "Dick." But in spite of their sympathy for Sir Philip they show no disposition to coldshoulder Mrs. McCreery, who is a most estimable woman. Burlingame wants to do the right thing and it proposes to show Mrs. McCreery that provincialism is not so vast out here as some of our critics would imply. Everyone has been reading up in the Peerage so that no one will commit the faux pas of addressing Mrs. McCreery as "My Lady," that title having been abandoned when she sought a new honeymoon. But the subtleties of the situation are by no means solved with the title question. Mrs. McCreery is still "accepted" by London society but a certain amount of "discipline" goes with the acceptance on account of the standing of her ex-husband, and Burlingame leaders wish to show that they know "a thing or two." And so they are preparing a welcome that shall be both "mulled" and "frapped" to the most exacting degree of polite continental society.

Addie Hasn't "Arrived"

I heard that Addison Mizner has failed in his ambition to become the Harry Lehr of New York society. The circus element in New York society, a correspondent writes me, has become decidedly outre. Addison's greatest ally was Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs who promised to lift him into the limelight and stand sponsor for his wit until the cows came home, but she is now preoccupied with Mr. Black and has no time to devote to the Mizner interests. Addie's boom died a-bornin'. But he wasn't given half a chance, for Addie is unquestionably a wit. That was generally admitted even in San Francisco smart society which frequently made him the theme of its anvil chorus. He recently said to a friend, "I feel as though now I could return to San Francisco with impunity since they have said everything they could about me and have exhausted their stock of deprecatory material." But while there is a Mizner warming his tootsies at the Yerkes' fire-side Addie will be in no hurry to return to San Francisco.

The Robinson Reilleys

From a San Francisco woman who recently met the Robinson Reilleys in Europe I learn that their adoration of each other is the scandal of their set. Time has in no degree assuaged the ardor of their mutual affection. Mrs. Reiley has grown stouter but doesn't seem to mind in the least the obliteration of the graceful curves that gave such a charm to the figure of beautiful Genevieve Goad. My informant says that Mrs. Reiley has no curiosity respecting San Francisco.

Jaundice In Society

The fact that three young society girls are suffering from jaundice has given the wags an opportunity to polish up some pertisms. The girls were all scheduled to make their bow to society this year but they decided that it would be a "calamity" season and they would not bud. But as matters adjusted themselves it has been a very happy season and the girls that did come out have had no cause to regret their decision. Wherefore 'tis said the others "have crept into the jaundice state by being peevish" over their mistake. But I am sure Helen Baker, who is one of the sufferers, couldn't be peevish even if the circumstances warranted it, so sunny a disposition has she. Her debut was projected into next season because the Bakers could not find a house in town suitable for entertaining. They are still in San Rafael but poor Helen has been at a sanitorium in town.

Miss Blair's Activities

Miss Jennie Blair has been so engrossed with business affairs that she has not been so alert socially this season as in former years. I am told that she is an unusually clever business woman and that no big estate has been put on a surer footing than the Blair holdings. The circumstance that much of their property was on Van Ness avenue has of course proved most advantageous. It was in the handsome old Blair home on the avenue that the buds of more seasons than some people care to recall each year had a gala luncheon. This season Miss Blair did not entertain the debutantes. She is an unusually charming hostess and the guests whom she has bidden to a dinner party on the opening night of the Fairmont Hotel are looking forward to a delightful time. "Ned" Greenway will also entertain a large dinner party on that night, and from the number of table reservations made by society people April 19th will be a gilt letter day on the brand new calendar of the Fairmont. The present labor difficulties will probably affect the illumination of the hotel, making an electrical display impossible. But the management will solve the lighting problem in some adequate manner.

Cafe Chantant For Charity

Mrs. Inez Shorb White has arranged for a novel entertainment in aid of the organ fund of St. Dominic's Church, to be given in the Pompeian Garden of Tait's Cafe on Saturday evening, April 13. The affair will take the form of a Cafe Chantant concert, under the direction of Dr. H. J. Stewart. Many of the best artists in the city have promised to assist, and as a host of society leaders are on the list of patrons success seems already assured.

chased by Mrs. Fiske, but it is a clever little play all the same. It was at the Carnegie Lyceum that Mrs. Gerberding was honored by the production of her play. "The Prize" is a one-act drama. It was first presented in this city three years ago by the Spinners' Club. Mrs. Mark Gerstle had the leading role, that of the society adventuress. The other parts were played by Margaret Bender, Dr. Shiels and Fred Healy. The performers in New York were members of the senior class of the Academy of Dramatic Art. Mrs. Gerberding leaves shortly for Europe.

A Del Monte Function

My Monterey correspondent writes: "Several months ago the east porch of Del Monte, overlooking Laguna del Rey, was enclosed in glass, and this sheltered spot with its charming view was transformed into a ladies' grill room. Several functions given by the very elite of Del Monte have been held there, and some of the oldest, most historic silver now in the possession of Californians has gleamed from the tables in this charming room. A few days ago decorators, musicians and caterers were hard at work preparing for the most elaborate tea ever given at Del Monte. Mrs. James Colquhoun was the hostess at this delightful affair, and her guests were of the most exclusive of Del Monte's aristocracy. The room was a bower of apple blossoms and pink roses. Smilax festooned the walls. Sweet strains of music indicated that somewhere behind the ferns musicians were concealed. Candelabra with pink shades were on the rose-strewn tables. Mrs. Colquhoun's guests were Mrs. Charles A. Laton, Mrs.

M. C. Low, Miss Flora Low, Mrs. Thomas Breeze, Miss Louisa Breeze, Mrs. H. C. Benson, Mrs. Henry Schmeidell, Mrs. J. W. Coffin, Mrs. Henry Clay Quinby, Mrs. A. N. Towne, Mrs. Clinton E. Worden, Mrs. E. L. Bliss, Mrs. Frederick Lake, Mrs. B. E. Kinsley of Providence, Rhode Island, and Miss Stearns and Miss J. A. Shoemaker of Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania. Mrs. Colquhoun's home is in Tunbridge Wells, England. For many winters they have lived at Del Monte. Mr. Colquhoun has large copper interests in Arizona. I believe his title is that of the Copper King. They are delightful Scotch people, and Mrs. Colquhoun has a most fascinating accent, and a very charming and unostentatious personality."

Sadler-Mead Engagement

The engagement has been announced of the engagement of Miss Mae Lydia Sadler, daughter of the Charles M. Sadlers of Alameda, and Mr. Louis Risdon Mead, proprietor of Byron Hot Springs. Mr. Mead has a host of friends in this city and he is receiving felicitations on all sides. Miss Sadler is quite a social favorite in Alameda and is noted for her musical talents.

The charity carnival given by the Ladies' Relief Society of Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse was both an artistic and financial success. One of the most pleasing numbers on the programme was a mandolin and guitar duet by Miss Theresa and Miss Lily Sherwood.

Mrs. Warren Revived

"For eloquent silence," says the New York Sun, "few occasions can beat the revival of 'Mrs. Warren's Profession' Saturday week at the Manhattan. The absence of any effect whatever is about the most damaging condemnation on record of the recent attempt to lay violent hands on the artistic liberty of an enlightened people. When the play was first put on, not so many months ago, you would have thought that it threatened the chastity of all wives, the innocence of all daughters, the utter debauching of the entire male population. The yellowest of the jaundiced screamed a moral scream as loud as its headlines. A Police Commissioner laid aside his professional, and largely futile, struggle against vice in the concrete to exercise, as a work of supererogation, an inquisitorial tyranny upon Literature and the Drama. Blinking at the open debauchery of the Tenderloin, he haled into a court of common criminals two dignified and self-respecting gentlewomen, whom he charged with a heinous offence—they had lent their artistic powers to a open minded presentation of what little can be said in behalf of those wretched women whom he condoned. On the revival of the play the police were powerless, for the Court had already reprimanded them for their presumption; and the Court is now justified by the event. The only people to be injured were the ticket speculators, who had banked heavily upon a renewal of the succes de scandal. By 8 o'clock they were offering fistfuls of tickets below par. Big nicks had been taken out of the edge of their expectations. The organs that had thundered loudest against the original performance maintained a Sabbath silence as deep as if it had been holy. The evidence was absolute that they had raised a tempest in a teapot. Mrs. Warren has been professing nightly, and if she were Wisdom crying in the streets she could not be less heeded. The inference is obvious. As far as those in authority are concerned, an intelligent public can be trusted to look out for its own manners and morals, and had best be left to do so. It is a matter of common proof. Once the managers thought that they could make money by exposing the female figure in the almost altogether. They soon found their mistake. The desire of the gentler sex to see fine frocks from Paris and London proved stronger than anybody's desire not to see them. Once it was thought that fortune lay in exploiting the woman with a past. The past of the woman who has it is like the most candid snow of yesteryear. Or, to quote one of the managers, there's no money after all in adultery. Well, suppose we make fun of impropriety, even of immorality? The French farce is as dead as the nails in the doors about which it was constructed. But if it is intelligent, subtle in its way refined? Alfred Capus's comedy 'The Two Schools' was a gay, spirited, worldly wise presentation of the idea that a wife's best way is to pretend not to know it when a husband goes out on the tiles. It was a dismal failure.

"None of these plays was interfered with by authority. Bernard Shaw's play was more severely dealt with because it appealed not to any evil desire but to the social intelligence. That made it insidious, poisonous—or so a public and a policeman deemed who were not, as it seems, on the most intimate terms with their intelligence. In point of fact, as it has proved, that was what made it the least dangerous of the lot. Good people do not go to the theatre to exercise their intellects. It hurts them. If the press had raised no hypocritical outcry and the Commissioner had kept on his job 'Mrs. Warren's Profession' would have been recognized from the start for what it is—a clever and stimulating bit of dialectics, but quite negligible as a dramatic presentation of character and emotion, in short as uninteresting to the Broadway public as it is harmless to anybody. Some day 'Salome' will be revived, and then it will be found that as few folks care for the new Adam or the new music in it as for Shavian socialism."

A Triumphant Soubrette

"Fantana," the Shubert production at the American Theatre, fully realizes the expectations that were inspired by the most enthusiastic advance notices. It is a musical comedy with the Broadway flavor, none of which has been lost in the transplanting, for be it known, the company at the American which has been in process of pruning and grafting (not the municipal kind), for some time, is now in fine flower. The latest blossom that it has put forth is Florence Sinnott, a soubrette, one with twinkling feet and loads of that imponderable quality called magnetism. Miss Sinnott wriggled her way into popular favor on the swell of the first melody that was turned on for her benefit. She has a way with her, a fine alluring way and it is worth going more than a few blocks out of your way to get in touch with it. Miss Sinnott is one of those rare soubrettes that have charm enough to cover a multitude of shortcomings in a piece, but "Fantana" is a piece that seems to go automatically. In other words it has lots of go, enough to serve as motive power for some weeks. It abounds in clever musical numbers and bewitching ensembles. Through it all extends the deft hand of the resourceful stage manager who knows the importance of color effects and keeps a kaleidoscope in constant operation. In addition to Miss Sinnott the company has a new member in the person of Joe Miller, who plays a stage Frenchman in an unstagey way and makes a hit.

Manager Greenbaum announces that he has secured Theresa Carrenno, the greatest woman pianist the world has ever known, for next season.

The Chicago Symphony Concerts

Will Greenbaum could not have found a more appropriate attraction with which to close his remarkable season than a splendid symphony orchestra. He announces three concerts in this city by the famous Chicago Symphony Orchestra of fifty artists under the direction of Alexander Von Fielitz, an eminent composer and great conductor. Four vocal soloists and two instrumentalists accompany the organization on this tour. Mme. Marie Zimmerman is the soprano, Miss Elaine De Sellem contralto, Mr. E. C. Towne tenor and Dr. Schussler basso. The first concert will be given next Friday night, April 12, at Christian Science Hall, and the special features will be Dvorak's "New World Symphony" and the Victor Herbert Cello Concerto. At the second concert (Saturday evening) the much talked of overture, "The Land of the Mountain and Flood," by the young Scotch composer, Hamish McCunn, will be heard here for the first time. Mr. Foerstel, the violinist, will play the rarely heard Concerto by Bazzini and the symphony will be Raff's "Leonore." For Sunday afternoon, April 14, at 2:30 Manager Greenbaum has arranged what he terms a "Novelty Concert." The programme will consist mainly of works entirely new to us. Villiers Stanford's "Irish Rhapsody," Cowen's "Scandinavian Symphony" and a Suite called "Stimmungsbilder" by Von Fielitz, the conductor of the orchestra. In addition Mme. Zimmerman will sing the rarely heard arias, "Il Vit" from "Francesca de Rimini," and Dr. Schussler will sing the Prologue to Pagliacci, and the good old Tannhauser will close one of the most interesting programmes ever offered in this city. The orchestra will give a special performance at the Greek Theatre, Berkeley, Saturday afternoon, April 13, of which the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven will be the principal feature. Selections from Die Walkure and other interesting works will also be given. This will be welcome news to thousands of school teachers, students and others who find it impossible to make the journey to Berkeley on Thursday afternoons but who can easily do it on a Saturday. Take the 1:20 boat and you will arrive in good time. Seats for all of the office will be at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

Florence Roberts In a New Play

Florence Roberts is playing a very successful engagement at the Novelty Theatre, where her production of "The Strength of the Weak" is playing to crowded houses. This piece will be seen for the last time on Sunday night, as Miss Roberts has decided to stage her new Spanish play, "Maria Rosa," commencing Monday night. This is the piece lately brought out by the talented star in the East and its success has been most gratifying. It is a powerful drama from the pen of the same brilliant author who gave to the stage that intensely interesting story,

"Marta of the Lowlands." The play gives Miss Roberts unlimited opportunity for brilliantly effective emotional work and from all accounts she has made the hit of her career as the heroine of this drama of revenge. Seats for "Maria Rosa" are in big demand and the first night of the piece will see the house crowded to the doors.

Stockwell at the Colonial

The announcement that L. R. Stockwell, the old-time favorite comedian, is to return to the stage for a limited engagement, will be welcome news to local theatre patrons, as the veteran comedian has a host of admirers in this city. Mr. Stockwell will open up at the Colonial Theatre next Monday night in "The Cricket on the Hearth," the comedy in which John E. Owens and Joe Jefferson achieved so much success. As he has already appeared as Caleb Plumber, the part will not be new to him. The character is admirably suited to his comedic individuality. The full strength of the Colonial Stock Company will be utilized to assist the star comedian. No pains or expense will be spared in the mounting and staging of "The Cricket on the Hearth."

"Kreutzer Sonata," the great Russian play which is being so well presented at the Colonial this week, will close its successful run at this theatre Sunday night, with Saturday and Sunday matinees.

Wang at Idora

The summer season at Idora Park will open Monday evening with a gorgeous production of that mass of fun and pretty music called "Wang." Few of the comedy operas have remained as popular as this one, but then the music is exceptionally pretty and the comedy particularly clever. Ferris Hartman will play the title role and a capable cast of principals will assist. The chorus and orchestra at Idora under Paul Steindorff's direction are alone worth traveling far to hear. Idora Park is a delightful place for a Sunday outing. There is an excellent grill room, mammoth skating pavilion and a dozen other features.

The Petschnikoff Concerts

This Saturday and Sunday afternoons and next Tuesday evening the lovers of violin music will enjoy some rare treats at the cosy little Lyric Hall, when Alexander Petschnikoff, the greatest Russian violinist, and his talented wife, who is also a violinist, will render some rarely heard works for two violins and besides which Mr. Petschnikoff will play such important solos as the Mendelssohn Concerto, Wieniawski Concerto, Chaconne by Bach and Viuxtemp's "Fantasie Appassionata." The programmes are all very interesting and should attract goodly audiences for the Petschnikoffs are ranked very high in the artistic world. Complete programmes may be obtained at Kohler & Chase's, where the seats are now on sale. Mr. Fred Maurer will be the pianist. We have had considerable music this season, thanks to the energetic management of Will Greenbaum, but this is the first time since the disaster that the violinists have had their "innings." These artists will also appear at the Symphony Concert of the University of California next Thursday afternoon, when they will play the Mozart Concerto for violin and viola and Mr. Petschnikoff will play the brilliant concerto by Tchaikowsky.

"The Pit" at the Alcazar

The New Alcazar Stock Company will next week present "The Pit," a play that has achieved success throughout the country. It will be the first stock performance and should prove to be of great interest to local playgoers, inasmuch as the author, Frank Norris, was a San Franciscan. His story of "The Pit" was one of the most popular novels presented to the reading public in recent years and the dramatization made by Channing Pollock and produced by Wilton Lackaye has met with great success wherever produced. Mr. Pollock is also the author of "The Little Grey Lady" and "Clothes," which was produced last year by Grace George. The entire action of "The Pit" takes place in Chicago and graphically illustrates the operations during the cornering of the wheat market. The play is intensely interesting and carries with it a love interest that is both powerful and human. The opening act takes place in the foyer of the Auditorium Theatre in Chicago. The great climax of the play comes in the

At the New Alcazar Theatre Week Commencing Monday, April 8.

Bertram Lytell will assume the character of Curtis Jadwin, which was originally played by Wilton Lackaye, and Laura Lang will be seen in the leading feminine role of Laura Dearborn.

The Daly Company

At the Van Ness Theatre commencing with next Monday night the Augustin Daly Musical Company will play an engagement of two weeks, the first of which will be devoted to "A Country Girl" and the second to another successful musical comedy, "The Cingalee." The fame of the Augustin Daly musical comedy is world-wide and the organization comes here with two of the most brilliant hits of Daly's New York and London theatres. Among the principals of the organization are Melville Stewart, Sam Collins, Hallen Mostyn, Harold Vizard, Adam Dockray, Edward Earle, Misses Elgie Bowen, Genevieve Finlay, Viola Kellogg, Laura Butler, Grace Gresham and others. "A Country Girl" is said to be an especially fine production. London audiences did not grow tired of the piece until it held the boards at Daly's Theatre for over three years. The runs in New York, Boston and Chicago have been phenomenal. There are many song hits in the piece.

In the Limelight

For the second week of their engagement at the Van Ness Theatre the Daly Musical Company will present "The Cingalee."

N. C. Goodwin will probably give a few performances of "When We Were Twenty One" during his coming engagement at the Novelty Theatre.

Lillian Russell will follow the Augustin Daly musical Company at the Van Ness Theatre. She will be ably supported by a strong company in her new comedy called "The Butterfly."

Sam Colins of "The Silver Slipper" fame is the chief comedian of "A Country Girl" cast.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The programme at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday matinee will certainly serve to maintain the enormous popularity of this theatre, for it is rich in novel and clever acts and promises a most delightful evening's entertainment. The Bellong Brothers' sensational acrobats and cyclists, who are credited with giving one of the most novel and daring exhibitions in vaudeville, will make their first appearance. Then there will be Dorothy Drew, one of the greatest favorites that ever visited this city, a top-notch singing comedienne. Ferguson and Mack, two of the funniest of knockabout comedians, will present a new act. A. Brookman and the Phillip Sisters, fresh from European triumphs, will appear in what is said to be a remarkably clever and diverting performance. Charley Case, Kelly and Rose and the La Maze Brothers will also be among the performers. It will be the last week of Edwin Stevens, who has achieved one of the most brilliant successes of his exceptionally brilliant career. For the coming week he promises as his offering "An Evening with Dickens," in which he will impersonate Micawber, Uriah Heep, Dick Swivel-ler, Grandfather Small-weed and other creations of the great author. All his changes will be made in sight of the audience and he will have the assistance of Tina Marshall, who will impersonate Agnes Wickfield and "The Marchioness."

MISS FLORENCE SINNOTT

The New Soubrette Who is Making a Big Hit in "Fantana" at the American Theatre.

The Bonds of Matrimony

By Rosalie Neish

I.

The Small Man and the Large Woman

They had not long been united in the bonds that are so often unholy; but already they had taken their assorted places. There had been no gradual and mutual accommodation, none of the matrimonial "settling down" that occurs with the well-regulated married people. He was a small man, red-haired and meagre; she was an immense woman, with a staring blue eye and a chin that was gradually but surely doubling itself.

Being small, he should, according to experience and in fulfillment of the laws of compensation, have been master, and she slave. He should, vulgarly speaking, have been a combination of man and cock-of-the-walk, while she should have been placid, docile, and even lethargic.

The small man in fulfilling these laws bullies the large woman. He, being made of quicksilver is irritable and peremptory. She, being merely made of dough sits in massive state awaiting his kneading of her.

But this couple were different to any I have seen: She was not only massive but irritable and peremptory, while he was small and nervously apologetic. He was a person to be pitied, for the average little man blusters and terrorizes, but he is at least a man, whereas the little creature who is made in the image of man, who is terrorized over and obliterated by a large female, is surely a sight to make angels weep and men regret God's afterthought—Woman. I often watched this couple in public, and sometimes shuddered to picture them in private.

Poor little man!

Once only I spent an ill-timed hour in his, or, rather, her house. Encouraged, perhaps, by my mute sympathy, he ventured to openly contradict an obvious misstatement she had made.

"My dear," began timidly, "I beg your pardon, but you are not quite—"

"Who wants your opinion, you little fool," she muttered in a loud aside. "Kindly mind your own business"; and she turned to me again.

The little man subsided. How could he mind his own business. He had no business—no business to contradict her, no business to an opinion, no business, apparently, even to exist; above all, no business ever to have married her.

Glancing furtively at him as I bid her good-bye, I fancied I detected on his small face an expression that showed me he had seen himself. He felt, I am sure, a sudden realization of the truth of her words, "you little fool."

It was an obvious truth; but I wondered, knowing women, why, oh! why did he not as well as realizing his weakness, realize also his strength, and turn and rend her?

Nothing, had he but known it, is so easily cowed or so easily terrorized as the "bully woman."

But he—poor little man, did not even suspect that liberty lay within his reach. She was right after all. He was only "a little fool."

II.

The Second Marriage

I sometimes think there must be a sad awakening for the widower who, in marrying a second time, takes to himself a girl young enough to have played the part of daughter to the wife of his youth.

I know such a couple, and they are a continual source of wonder, if not amusement.

A friend of mine, young, beautiful, and irresponsible, lately married a rich widower noted for nothing save a large banking account and set opinions.

"He will bully you, Alicia," I said, warningly. "They say he bullied his first wife."

She turned a roguish face over a plump shoulder.

"No man will bully me," she said, cheerfully. "You wait and see."

"But they say he is mean!"

"I am generous enough for two," she laughed.

"But he won't give you any money."

"There are such things as shops and credit accounts."

"He is old-fashioned too," I said, "and early Victorian in his ideas."

She shook her head gaily—like a young colt who fears neither bridle nor curb.

"I am modern enough to outweigh the balance."

Six months later I went to stay with them.

He was meaner than ever, sterner, colder, more unsympathetic, and a would-be tyrant and grumbler to boot; but she was still radiant and still wholly irrepressible.

She had an art in managing him all her own. She ran up the housekeeping books to entertain her friends, and sending away his furniture, ordered in her own. She burnt the green rep curtains that dated from his honeymoon; but dressed deliciously, leaving him to pay for the clothes.

In vain he stormed and raved and sulked; she only laughed, and threatened to go to a hotel until he grew calm again.

He was helpless, for the gods he worshipped were respectability and his position in the city; and she traded on this knowledge, knowing he would shrink from nothing so much as publicity.

The curious part was that she enjoyed life immensely.

"My dear," she said, "I am perfectly happy. I want neither his sympathy nor his approval." She made a grimace that was rebellious but charming. "I only want his money—and I have got it."

"He will pillory you in the papers," I said.

"He daren't."

"He will leave you nothing in his will."

"I have a settlement," she replied gaily. "Besides, I shall marry again."

She was quite hopeless in every way; hopelessly young, and hopelessly happy; and he, having made an enormous income, might as well have been a bank clerk on $5 a week for all the fortune he could save.

He had married a young girl with a view to forming her mind and teaching her to help him accumulate his money.

He found himself attached, "until death parted them," to a butterfly whose one idea was to seek life's sunshine and scatter with her delicate wings the pollen of his fortune.

W. C. Walker of Hartford, Connecticut, president of the Pope Automobile Company, arrived from the East yesterday to look over the local field. The automobile business in California has grown to such great proportions recently that the big Eastern manufacturers are giving their personal attention to it, and Walker's visit probably will result in an extension of the business of his company on the Coast.

Denver opened its eyes the other day at the sight of an elephant enjoying a motor car ride. The favored pachyderm was on the bill at a vaudeville theatre and late working hours had necessitated an outing for the benefit of his health. To insure the elephant's safety his owner chose for the ride the car of tested materials—a Winton.

The crew of the Oldsmobile as it finished the $6,000 Challenge Race from Los Angeles at Twelfth and Broadway, Oakland, on last Saturday morning. At the wheel is Ralph Owen, who drove the car all of the way. Beside him is H. O. Harrison. In the tonneau are R. G. Emmons and W. A. Peck. Mr. Owen never left the wheel for the forty-six hours of the run and none of his crew had a wink of sleep during that time. As the Oldsmobile drove up to the finish Fernando Nelson turned to E. P. Brinegar and said: "I guess I can draw a check to your order for $6,000." And this he did, the last official act of the race. This is the longest competitive automobile race ever run, and great credit is due the Pioneer Automobile Company and to the endurance and good judgment of Mr. Owen and his crew, and the splendid behavior of the car, for the success of the race.

AN ARIZONA STORY

In "Pardner of Blossom Range" Frances Charles has gone back to the scene of her first success, Arizona. The period is now, happily, well in the past, that time in the history of the territory when Indian outrages were the rule and the venturesome settlers never safe for twenty-four hours together. The scene of the story is a fertile valley in the south-western part, near the Mexican border, and therefore the more liable to attack. The owner of the claim is a child-like and loveable old man known to everyone as Jeddy Blossom, and in contrast to his garrulous good nature there is his cook, Marathon Alden, called Molly, cantankerous and crank, but tolerated because he was a schoolmate of Jeddy's, when they were both boys in Missouri, two score and more years earlier. Jeddy was only nominal head of his ranch, however, for his granddaughter Holly ruled him and everyone else, though with such a gentle, if firm hand, that few suspected they were under petticoat government. Holly was called Holly Blossom, though her real name was Holly Judd. She was the only one of her sex in the establishment; her mother and grandmother both having died in her infancy, and, like girls raised by and amongst men, she had a different standard of honor and a more straightforward manner than most women, though, and naturally enough considering her youth, she had not learned to consider both sides of a story before giving judgment. This girl is the motif of most of the sentimental element of the story, and she is the heroine of the romance which deals mainly with the stirring affairs of men, such affairs as are characteristic of the border drama and which are invariably interspersed with thrills. Army officers and cowboys contribute much of the life that is dealt with in this very interesting story. Published by Little, Brown & Co.

Milan and the Muse of Anacreon

Bianca (and her mother) during my brief harboring in Milan. It is pleasant, now and here, in the smoke-shadows of London, to think of Bianca (and her mother). What if I had gone to another hotel!

The Milanese are a pleasant people, more open, frank and honest than the southern Italians, due, perhaps, to their descent from the German Lombards who mastered the north of Italy in 568, abandoned their Arian faith and became Italianized. This greater probity may likewise be due to their proximity to the good Switzers. Their cookery, too, is better here, for they use butter instead of the abhorrent oil. It was in the dining-room of my hotel. Full of distrust of the menu and to make doubly sure, I was painfully explaining to the waiter: "Voglio avere i cibi con burro, non con olio"—simple words expressed in most academic Italian. The waiter, strangely enough, though an Italian, did not understand. For he was an Italian Swiss and my rich southern accent so arduously acquired in Sicily under the tutelage of the good French Abbe Boivin was utterly wasted upon him. French produced a shrug, German a shake of the head, English a smile and outstretched arms. In vain! in vain! Was I to starve amidst plenty? The usual placards hung about the walls.—English is spoken. Man spricht Deutsch. On parle Français. The waiter who did so was always "out." A very soft laugh came from the adjoining table. A dark, middle-aged lady dressed in widow's weeds was seated there and a young girl of some seventeen years. The signora rippled forth a cascade of fluent syllables to the waiter whose perplexed face broke into smiles, whose body unhinged in many bows. And soon I had my dishes cooked a la Milanese. But that laugh! it had fallen from the rich, red lips of that incomparable Italian maid. She was not one lightly to be overlooked. Let me endeavor to describe her. It is little to say that her eyes were full of the mystical midnight which haunts the eyes of da Vinci's Mona Lisa. Her ringletted hair was dressed in a strange old-fashioned manner. She looked like a full-blooded incarnation of Anacreon's Muse or the living embodiment of some Raphaelite vision. She was not only beautiful in the simplest sense of beauty but also wonderful in the richest sense of wonder. The magic of opulent centuries concentrated in this rare, classic child, this sweet flower and essence of the Italian earth. Upon her full and flushing cheeks perennial freshness seemed to bloom; no modern lassitude or pallor blighted her joyous health. It was something like genius shining visibly, some exaltation expressed in archaic perfection of lineament and dwelling in the light of eyes. These eyes, which were uncommonly large and dark, were filled with enigmas like those of a radiant sphynx, frustrating all endeavors at solution. Not alone her eyes but all her features seemed expressive, as though a light shone through from within. Of course, dear thing, she was unconscious of it; never, perhaps, felt her kinship with the gods of old. And it was she who had laughed when I ordered my bistecca fried in butter instead of oil! The mother, upon whose upper lip a delicate moustache grew, smiled pleasantly; I bowed and raised my glass of Marsala wine, for in Italy even poets may always drink wine. The next morning at breakfast, by gracious invitation, I was requested to seat myself at the table of Signora ——— and her daughter Bianca. Our conversation, be sure, was limited in intelligibility, but intense in style and expression. We discovered that we understood one another far better if, after several oral attempts, we wrote down our phrases. So all the menu-cards in the place were scribbled full, for which the Swiss waiter had to be appeased with an extra tip. Much laughter, entrancing talk, despairing search for words, many radiant smiles—and the signora sitting between.

That night we three went to the grand Teatro La Scala, the largest, I believe, in the world. Six of our little American play-boxes could easily be packed into it. Balcony rises upon balcony unto dizzy regions of the roof. A vast, chaotic gloom thronged with shadowy thousands above and below, white gas-globes glowing like wan little suns around the red plush-covered loges, a low, multitudinous murmur everywhere in the semi-darkness, stray notes flying about in the auditorium like bats or birds or bees from the instruments being tuned in the gigantic orchestra below the obscurity of the stage,—lo, our seats!—and the signora sitting between. And there was light, a flowing swell of music, the enormous curtain rolled upward and Donizetti's merry opera of "Don Pasquale" ran sweetly on in melody. After the opera came a magnificent spectacle and ballet called "Luce," a most wonderful affair lasting for two hours. There were endless stage-pictures, marvelous splendors of light and color, a never-ending revel of kaleidoscopic figures, ever-changing and ever-new in costumes, color, scenery and symbol. The stage swarmed with its dancing hundreds and swam in a blaze of glory, the music raved, the graceful prima ballerina capered with fairy lightness on fatigueless toes before this shifting, dazzling background, and radiant Luce with her star-tipped wand forever defeated the fell designs of the Prince of Darkness. Anacreon's re-incarnated Muse sat with calm yet shining eyes and exquisite profile luminous in the reflected glare from the stage. No doubt to her it was nothing entirely novel, but all vague and mystical with remembrances of olden rites in temples of Greece or groves of Thessaly, when she gazed in perfect peace upon her dancing worshippers and cymballing corybantes, or, hearing the rapturous lyre of the sun-god joined in the dance herself with the priests and her resplendent sisters. In Naples at the great Teatro San Carlos I had seen a similar fantasia after the initial performance of "Adriana Lecouvreur" (it lasted until three o'clock in the morning) but never before had I seen the great eyes of an heathen nymph of ancient times bent complacently upon the modern splendor that is sham and the modern merriment that frolics in the shadows of superstition and amid the ceaseless sighs of humanity. And no Luce with her starry wand can ban these shadows yet, Muse of Anacreon, and bring back your golden days of joy to this harried world. You yourself, deep-eyed divinity, will kneel to-morrow in the great marble Duomo before beautiful plaster saints and marble madonnas painted and gilt. You will offer up prayers to the victorious new god that deposed you and firmly believe that the new Elysium is not far beyond the clouds, and the awful region of the new Orus but a little way underfoot, and that assiduous flattery of this new benevolent deity will secure you bliss forever. Should I, to secure bliss for an hour, (in beholding you) consent to accompany you and your mother to mass, your mother, as we take our seats, will be found sitting between us. And I who am a lesser heathen, a free barbarian from the West, recognizing all that is so heathen and so Hellenic in you, shall be debarred from the happiness of your pacific presence by the ever-intervening bulk of your mother. I do not believe in worshipping from afar nor in absent treatments do I believe! No, to-morrow at the hour of high-mass, I shall promenade in the fine Galleria Vittorio Emanuele and in the market-place where flowers are sold and where pigeons flutter.

My trade being soon cunningly discovered, I was requested to exercise it and write a poem as a souvenir of our acquaintance. That was something which I promised quickly enough and in this instance as quickly performed. Indeed, whoever, in the light of such inspiration had not done as well or better than I, should have been hamstrung, or doomed to write enough lines of minor magazine-poetry to stretch from the Earth to the moon. These verses are to be read only in Italy and only by the light of such eyes and of such a smile as shone in the ravishing features of the young nymph. Nor is the name Bianca to be pronounced "By-ank-er" as I heard one of a group of New England school-mistresses pronounce it before a painting in a gallery a few days before, but softly in

A GIRL'S BOOK

"Kristy's Rainy Day Picnic" will prove a welcome addition to the little girl's shelf of the book case. Kristy was one of that numerous band who "could listen to stories all day, and all night, too." She was to have celebrated her birthday by a picnic, but the morning of that anniversary dawned with leaden skies and sheets of falling rain. The little girl's not unnatural repining reminded mamma of a story, and one led to another. Mamma, who thought she had intercepted a knowing wink from the weather-man, allowed herself to be committed to a bargain by which she was to tell stories till it stopped raining. During the afternoon, a neighbor came in with her sewing, and relieved guard for a while, and in the evening the importunate little miss was still unsatisfied. Just before bed time Uncle Tom came bringing with him a girl cousin who had been out to San Francisco, and she added her quota by telling of her experience in the earthquake and fire, so that the "little pitcher" had in all sixteen new additions to her lore. The stories cover a wide range of subjects and are all related with the personal touch which delights children who importune to be told about "when you were little." Olive Thorne Miller has observed two cardinal rules of the good narrator. She has not "written down," and her morals are not "rubbed in," something which children never forgive. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have made a very acceptable little volume, with end papers and colored illustrations, and what is of infinitely more importance, good print and paper.

the Italian fashion, "Bee-ahn-kah!" Follows my unworthy exercise.

ALLA BELLA BIANCA DI MILANO

Bianca! Bianca!
Thine eyes are like a sibyl's eyes
For they are molten with the night;
They guard a strange, sequestered light
That to some golden future flies
From out some golden past.
Yea, they are overcast,—

Bianca!
With mystery and stellar sheen,
Calm, liquescent, vespertine!

Bianca! Bianca!
Thy mouth is like a muse's mouth
Of coral to a flageolet,
A chanting muse whose lips are wet
With nectar never knowing drouth,
And when, immersed in dreams,
Their music stifled seems,

Bianca!
They make a living harp that hoards
Old memories in its silent chords.

Bianca! Bianca!
Shouldst thou unleash thy trammelled hair
And crown thee with a myrtle crown,
And sable torrents rushing down,
Blot ivory shoulders warm and bare,— Lo! pipes of Pan would call
Thee to his festival,

Bianca!
And thou wouldst dance away and leave
The saddened world and me to grieve!

At dinner I read it—nothing but empty Saxon sound—to mother and daughter. But, at the title and the frequent repetitions of her name, Bianca laughed silverly and clapped her hands until the large golden hoops in her tiny ears danced and swung. The dim memories of days when greater poets had written of and to her came back, no doubt, from beyond the centuries. I folded the sheet and reached it across the table to her. But the mother, sitting between us, swiftly put forth her hand and, courteously enough, took the paper, at the same time knocking over a tall straw-bound bottle of wine on the snowy table-cloth. That was a good omen, they said, and instantly I thought of ancient oblations to the gods and the custom of spilling from the goblet a few drops of wine upon the ground to appease the powers of Olympus. But I do not believe it was a good omen, I do not believe it. Signora ——— (the dash stands for separation) read the poem or rather regarded it blankly, then handed it to her daughter. Bianca fed full on her name and the exclamation points and tucked the manuscript in the bosom of her dress—rare sanctuary where vestal purity lived enshrined. Yet this muse was not content with a mere tribute of verse at her altars. The sight of my sketch-book evoked a request for a drawing of her head, the sight of my camera for a photograph of herself "e mia madre." My pencil staggered at the attempt and though the sketch was but a caricature, it resulted in mellifluous raptures from muse and mother. Three months afterwards, as I was developing my photographs, I discovered, with infinite regret, that the jealous sun-god, unwilling that I should possess the features of his beautiful handmaid, had, alas! blasted the film with haloes of excessive light and shadows of Stygian darkness. Very often I think of these two, of Bianca (and her mother), of this encounter of no significance but of lasting charm. They formed one of those blessed isles of Friendliness set in great desert seas of stranger-folk, wherein the solitary wanderer may while for a time and feel himself akin to his kind. Lonely enough was most of the journey to one who could be merely a spectator, and if these few bright points did not dot his map, then the most splendid cities of Earth would resolve themselves to sheer barren masonry and stony, inhospitable paves.

The glowing Muse of Anacreon sometimes rises in my vision; her young face and still but lustrous eyes bring back all Italy, yet she never appears singly. Where Bianca shines, her mother looms. In my memory they remain indissolubly united. I could not but resent a certain needless emphasis placed upon the chaperonage of this charming acquaintance. The chaperon is the invention of the devil. Easily I bow to the customs of different countries, nor would I, in this instance, murmur much against the excessive vigilance of that gracious Italian lady, the mother of Bianca. All honor to her—for being the mother of Bianca. But the Argus-eyed chaperon is the invention of the devil. The custom assumes that all men are designing scoundrels and all women feeble fools. So do customs become curses and fall upon the just and the unjust and so it must, I fear, remain,—until there be found a way "to read the heart's construction in the face." Until then, relentless duennaship and close-guarding of Hesperidean treasure shall prevail. The unremittent chaperon is the invention of the devil. However:—

I said farewell to Bianca (and her mother) and went to the Italian lakes. Northward by train from Milan for an hour or so into the hills, then, behold! the mountains uplift themselves and one is in a different land and a different clime. The white peaks lay close-packed above the green ones in this Italian Switzerland, but the weather was warm as in summer. At Chiasso the swift St. Gothard expresses come rushing down like avalanches out of the ice-bound mountains and the prolonged gloom of the great ten-mile tunnel. The new Simplon tunnel had just been completed, a marvel of modern engineering, piercing the insurmountable mass of the Alps with another tube of communication between southern and northern Europe. This is one of the great material achievements of mankind and modernity. I thought of Carthaginian Hannibal rending and blasting his way through the rock-ribbed mountains and impasses and fastnesses of snow and ice with his fires and his vinegar. And now the pampered tourist flies through the core of the ever-lasting ranges in a palatial car electrically lit, and feasts daintily as he flies. From here it is but a step back to Italy.

The Lago di Como, ethereally blue, gleamed in the sun and the pure air like lapis lazuli amidst folds of emerald plush. Nothing more enchanting can be conceived than a trip about this beautiful lake and its connecting basins, on one of the swift little steamers which run from village to village along the shores, touching briefly and lightly at each, like a hummingbird visiting flowers. The steamer foams along, square-sailed boats with round framework move slowly over the still waters, peaceful little hamlets with their picturesque church-spires emerge and fade away with tinkle of bells, on the banks washerwomen beat white linen on the stones, brave peasants are seen and lusty mountaineers, castles rise upon the hills against the sky, the lofty Brumate Kulm with its great hotel and steep cog-wheel railroad mounts imposingly above the lake. So before all this beauty at Lake Como I sat down upon a gigantic boulder, and to test my loyalty to California, wrote a few verses upon my leaving it, for I knew that loyalty could stand no greater strain than before all this temptation to be disloyal. Then downward to Milan again, where I saw Bianca (and her mother) not any more, but went to Verona.

The McCarthy

The wheels of industry at the Fairmont were stopped last week that the Hon. P. H. McCarthy might have the important question of his supremacy determined. By this episode the salient personality of the imperial labor leader was once more thrust upon our notice. In our preoccupation with matters affecting our keenest apprehensions respecting the welfare of this city we were absolutely indifferent to the existence of the great Dictator. And yet it is most difficult to bring oneself to a state of mind from which consideration of McCarthy is excluded. It is as hard to render oneself oblivious to the Boss of the Building Trades as it is to achieve insensibility to the aftermath of a gasoline wagon. But when the collapse of the municipal graft machine occurred we assumed that its principal gear-wheel would cease from whirling. Absurd assumption! We should have known that McCarthy generates rotatory power upon his own person. As nothing can stop him, why should he subside? True, he stood sponsor in the councils of organized labor for Schmitz and Ruef and kept his formidable tongue unsheathed in their defense even unto the last ditch, but no such small disaster as that which has occurred could reduce the temperature of his soul. He is just as exuberant and active as a man of his irrepressible nature might be expected to be. Schmitz and Ruef have been rendered innocuous, but that circumstance will have no effect on the brilliant career of the invincible Dictator of the industrial world. The McCarthy will continue to impose his ebullient temperament and capricious nature upon all matters affecting the employment of labor. When Abe Ruef was complaining of the tough fare vouchsafed him by Elisor Biggy, the McCarthy was gorging his stomach with the fat of the land by way of attesting his gratitude for escaping the many calamities with which Heaven has confused his confreres. The McCarthy affords a striking illustration of the privileged and superior station of the successful labor leader as compared with the mere citizen or employer of capital for the promotion of industry. He is truly representative of the Aristocracy of Indolence, a new class which must be reckoned with by politicians and political economists.

It comprises the elect of organized labor—the walking delegates and the officers of unions. Long may it flourish!

The Labor Cormorant

Fully as strong as the prejudice existing all over the country against the Plutocracy is that which has grown up in this city against this new Aristocracy of which the Hon. P. H. McCarthy is an effulgent luminary. This purely local prejudice is due entirely to the fact that we are in the grip of the cormorant of labor. This cormorant has an appetite which adjusts itself to the size of the spread. And it must be indulged. That is why we are having strikes and rumors of strikes and dissensions among the unionists. That is why a halt was called the other day on the triple shift system in building operations, an incident which has not been discussed in our cautious dailies despite their eagerness for the speedy rebuilding of the city. For awhile many of our enterprising men of wealth were employing mechanics in three eight-hour shifts. When the unions saw how desirable were these enterprising citizens of rushing their buildings to completion they decided to charge them at the rate of an hour and a half for every hour's work done at night, though, so far as the night-shifts were concerned the work was not properly designated over-time, since each shift worked but eight hours. This increase in the schedule caused some builders to discharge their night shifts, but some there were that submitted to this species of rapacity. By this submission the unions were encouraged to give the wage schedule another hoist. It was decided that after the electric lights were turned on wages should increase one hundred per cent. This turn of the thumb-screw was more than the builders could stand, and as a consequence many men were thrown out of employment. But this may not be the end, for the unions have a remedy: it is their privilege to supply day labor in consideration only of the employment of night labor according to the terms heretofore specified. Why should greedy capital be permitted to throw men out of employment? In this city at present the supply of labor is greater than the demand, a circumstance due in a measure to the fact that many of our capitalists prefer that their money should lie idle than that it should be used to appease the appetite of the labor cormorant. Obviously there is a lack of the altruistic spirit in the Plutocracy.

Unbecoming Prejudices

No sane man, says a contemporary, has any prejudice against organized labor. This postulate is somewhat inaccurate. For there are many sane men whose passions breed prejudices. There are moreover many sane men who, though they have no prejudice against the organization of labor, are intolerant of the abuses that grow out of labor organizations. Because unionists have their little tiffs and misunderstandings which must be adjusted by a McCarthy at the expense of an innocent third party; tiffs and misunderstandings which cause much damage before the chromatic effulgence of the rainbow glows in token of the passing of the storm and of the splicing of the tie that binds; because of these things, we say, the McCarthys of the Aristocracy of Indolence are charged by prejudiced men with being a menace to the peace and prosperity of the city greater than the forces of graft. These prejudiced ones are manifestly suffering from the blight of an obsession. They invariably take Mc-Carthy as a symbol because he has an ostentatious way of exalting in his own person the dignity of labor. It is painful to them to observe the ceremonials for which McCarthy is a stickler. If his were a more graceful personality it would be easier to take him as seriously as he demands, but it should be remembered that he is not a man of education. He came from the ranks and he abounds in that pride of position which is characteristic—to use a homely but not necessarily offensive figure—of the beggar on horseback. He justly feels that he incarnates the dignity of American Labor, that he is, moreover, the architect of his own fortune, and therefore that Capital should humble itself in his august presence. But considering his exalted station Capital should not feel that it sacrifices its self-respect in approaching him sinuously on its belly and hearkening deferentially as he sternly makes announcement to the accompaniment of a snap of his finger that he possesses the power to tie up the whole city with a word; nay, with a nod. It is no disgrace to make obeisance to Power. Admitting that he is a little overbearing at times after the manner of those drest in a little brief authority, the circumstance does not justify the wish that he were marooned on a lonely Pacific island. We should remember that power intoxicates the best of hearts, as wine the strongest heads. Capital should cultivate a spirit of humility. Capital should assuage its prejudices. When McCarthy spouts Roman history in broken English during a purely business interview, Capital should school itself to patience, for the Dictator has been improving his hours of indolence, and should be indulged in his passion for display. McCarthy is all right. A man of parts is McCarthy; especially, a man of head, and he truly symbolizes the dignity of organized labor.

The Roosevelt-Harriman Controversy

If the Bellamy Storer correspondence (which introduced dear Maria to a de-lighted world) and the Harriman letters are adjudged competent evidence on which to base an opinion it may be asserted with some appearance of truth that when President Roosevelt condescends to match epistles with an adversary he generally gets the worst of it. A careful reading and a painstaking comparison of the letters made public by both principals in the controversy which waged over the removal of the late ambassador to the court of Vienna resulted in the embarrassing discovery that the President had stooped to the suppression of vital parts of the correspondence and to the reconstruction (to speak euphemistically) of other portions in order to vindicate his motives and justify his actions. Furthermore it must be admitted, however reluctantly, that a collation of the available texts in the current unpleasantness between the President of the United States and the President of the Harriman system of railroads points to the employment of similar methods. Letters given out by the railway baron contain pregnant sentences that are entirely lacking in the copies of the same letters issued from the White House. There seems to be no denying also that the President resorted to a pitiful quibble in his denial of Harriman's story that he had been asked for a campaign contribution. All of which is food for much thought of a more or less obvious kind. But one curious phenomenon that has not received attention so far may be pointed out. It is this, that while evidence beyond dispute shows Harriman to be correct in his startling assertion that President Roosevelt sent for him and requested him to help the treasurer of the Republican party out of his desperate straits and while it seems equally clear that the President was far from ingenuous in his reply to the Harriman charge, nevertheless the weight of popular approval remains overwhelmingly on the side of the Chief Executive. Harriman may be correct, but none sympathizes with him. Roosevelt may have been inconsistent (to put it mildly) in exacting a campaign contribution from the chief of a great corporation and then hurling the most destructive engines of the government against that corporation; and he may have deserved unstinted blame for the manner in which he has met his accuser when these transactions became public; but notwithstanding all this, it is generally believed that he was actuated by praiseworthy motives, that the defects he has shown are the defects of his biggest and most valuable qualities and that no matter what embarrassing position Harriman may drive him into, the railway magnate is an exponent of the most dangerous theory of frenzied finance and as such entitled to absolutely no consideration. This may not be the attitude most consistent with cold logic; it may not commend itself to the thinker who sees the shades of color that prevent any character from being jetblack or lilywhite; but it is the general attitude and in such a controversy as this where the academic question is unimportant the general attitude is the one which counts.

Senatorial Prestige Fading

Time was in this glorious commonwealth when the United States Senate could substantiate a plausible claim to the appellation of "the most exclusive club in the world." There is a something of splendid exaggeration in this term that appeals even now to the rather slow-working mental processes of the average American person; it is a glittering tag which the populace hates to see removed, much as a decaying family hates to see the old and polished name-plate unscrewed from its ancient oaken door. But the day has come when this proud distinction must be surrendered. The Senate is still a club of very tolerable exclusiveness; the initiation fee is still beyond the paying of most of us, the elderly traditions still linger, the old atmosphere of ponderous dignity may still be breathed there. Yet is the Senate not just the same as it used to be. For one thing the English Parliament is threatening its long-unchallenged supremacy. Since muck-raking has spread to England and its noisome champions have invaded the sacred precincts of the House of Lords, it has become suddenly known that that refuge of titled drones is by no means lacking in the qualities on which the Senate has thus far based its claim to the haughty title. Among the lords as among our own wearers of the toga mammon has come to be the test of exclusiveness; the corporation champion, the trust knight, the hero whose lance is ever in rest to defend monopoly has come to be the very backbone and sinew of the British witenagemote. Sheer ability, unqualified brains, stark originality and naked worth have come to be frowned upon there to an extent which may excite the choler of a parvenue like Campbell-Bannerman but must command its proper meed of respect from every man who admires the negative virtues necessary in an American senator. However, if no more serious rival than the English House of Lords disputed the right of the Senate, that august body might still make weighty claim to the boast of being the most exclusive club in christendom. But there is another rival to be reckoned with, a rival whose claims must be acknowledged in silence or only disputed with disastrous consequences. This is none other than the Ananias Club. It was instituted by the highest power in the land, received its constitution and by-laws from that power and its membership, limited so far, to a bare eleven, is determined from the same sublime source. True, it has no local habitation, its members are scattered up and down this country of magnificent distances and most of them are unknown to one another in that fashion of clubable intimacy usually deemed necessary for a perfectly knit society, but none the less is it a true club of the most perfect exclusiveness. E. H. Harriman is its latest acquisition. His initiation fee was exactly $50,000 plus an amount of trouble that has no equivalent in trade symbols. With him in the club are Bellamy Storer, Alton B. Parker, Senators Chandler, Platt, Tillman and Bailey, Herbert W. Bowen, John F. Wallace, Henry E. Whitney and George O. Shields, surely as dazzling an array of manhood as was ever gathered together by common sympathies and similar achievement.

An Aristocracy of Liars

It is the enviable distinction of Mr. Harriman to have been branded by the President as a wilful and deliberate liar; Mr. Storer is acclaimed by the same authority a perfidious liar; Judge Parker is an atrocious liar; Chandler an unqualified liar; Whitney a deliberate liar; Bowen a disingenuous liar; Shields an inventive liar; Wallace an utter liar, and the others are of varying degrees of mendacious achievement delicately shaded and happily denominated as only a litterateur of President Roosevelt's exuberant diction could properly characterize them. Of course it must be understood, thoroughly to appreciate the exclusiveness of the club to which these gentlemen have been admitted, that their lying is not of the vulgar variety which consists in the unimaginative process of distorting truth to suit untoward circumstances. Biblical authority makes all men liars in that bourgeois sense which would destroy at once the exclusiveness of the Ananias Club. To lie, in the Rooseveltian sense, is to disagree with the President in a statement of facts and to substantiate your position by letters or other proofs of unquestioned authenticity. In this manner Mr. Harriman lied when he gave the country an insight into the inmost mysteries of campaign contributions; so he passed at once from that sphere wherein ordinary mortals are not privileged to breathe to the bosom of the Ananias Club. In this manner, too, Mr. Bellamy Storer lied when he and dear Maria left the gay court of Austria. In this manner Bowen lied when he came up from Venezuela and Wallace when he returned from Panama. And so with the rest; they have had the temerity to dispute facts with the President who of course cannot lie, being hedged about with a privilege of veracity that no documentary evidence can violate. Their audacity has been rewarded; their names will be linked forever with that of the unfortunate individual whose divagation from the straight road of truth-telling angered an Authority to whom President Roosevelt occasionally bows. They wear a decoration compared with which that "badge of success, the indictment" (to quote Mr. Hayman of the theatrical trust) is as a leather medal to a Golden Fleece. Even the "criminaloid," the illustrious pet of Professor Ross, is not to be included in the same class with them. Some day perchance they will insist that President Roosevelt shall willy-nilly become their president. Nor will they be entirely illogical in this, for it would seem that the President too has lied in the Rooseveltian sense, that is to say, that the President has disagreed with the President in statements of facts. When the day of his election to the Ananias Club comes President Roosevelt may solve one of the enigmas of the ages by answering Pilate's question.

Vicious School Societies

The suicide of a foolish school girl some time ago brought to a head the opposition of the educational authorities to the fraternities and societies of the high schools. From the recent action of a university society in the case of a member whose temperament was not agreeable to her associates we should judge that the authorities higher up might consider the advisability of putting it beyond the power of a clique of pupils to put a stigma upon the character of any of the student body. It has been obvious to the more earnest of the teaching profession, for at least fifteen years, that these secret organizations are an evil, that they encourage snobbishness and the pride of exclusiveness and other affectations that have no place in any institution supported by general taxation. Pupils of the present generation, and their parents, also, misapprehend the purpose of the public school system. The State does not educate individuals for the benefit of individuals, but for the benefit of the State. Discipline is an important element of education and no education is complete in which that element has been neglected. But nowadays parents and pupils act upon the theory that education is merely a matter of equipping boys and girls with a knowledge of certain subjects which will facilitate their journey through life. If such were the only purpose of education bachelors and parents who are able to educate their own children, would be justified in protesting against being assessed for the support of a public school system. This is a point that it might be well for the school authorities themselves to ponder whenever they feel inclined to grant concessions to pupils at the instigation of parents. They should remember that their authority proceeds from the State and not from mothers and fathers. We have wandered too far away from the principle that inspires public education. It is the principle that was first advanced by that wisest of lawmakers, Lycurgus, who prohibited parents from rearing their own children and who provided that the State should take full charge of the young Spartans and subject them to the severest discipline of a character designed to render them serviceable to their country. Lycurgus was a hard taskmaster, but he produced more wholesome results than any other ruler ever achieved.

The Three Elms

By Henry Normanby

They were of equal age and beauty, the three elms, and the memory of man failed and became extinct before it reached back through the years to the hour of their nativity. They were gracious to the sight, and their leaves made slumbrous music in the soft night breeze. A great brotherhood of soul was theirs, a sublime patience, an unfailing charity to every living thing. They stretched their arms hospitably, and the birds of the air came into them and made them their home. They lifted their heads in the sunlight and whispered their secrets beneath the moon. The compassionate rain brought them their peace and the harsh winds of winter moved them not to anger. In the days of their youth young children climbed about them and made merry in their branches, and in the fullness of time grew up to manhood and went their ways, forgetting them. But the three elms went not away, but remained and remembered.

Together they grew in their stateliness and strength, and toil was not theirs, neither sorrow, nor suffering. War and strife passed by them unheeding, leaving them to their august repose. Theirs was an added glory to the landscape, a culminating beauty to the wide stretch of verdurous earth. In the deep shade bestowed by them tired cattle found coolness and rest, and young lambs nestled therein, and the wayfarer unburdened himself and slept. Beneath them, in the rich autumnal noondays, aged children of the earth sat in contentment, becoming drowsily reminiscent, telling of the days of their adolescence, far back in the hazy region of the past.

Removed from all discord of commerce, they towered high and broadened nobly, and the green of their leaves was unsullied by the mire of cities and the noxious exhalations of factories. In the long June nights the benediction of their arms was given freely to the lovers who plighted troth in their spacious midst, and at eventide, in the great silence of winter, having cast off their garment of leaves, they slumbered, sleeping the dreamless sleep.

It was theirs, each one of them, to have an austere destiny, to take great part in the triumphant march of the world, to determine the tragedies of the lives of men, to be the agents of love and sorrow, of despair and death. They knew it not, the three elms, as they grew together in the sunlight, stretching out their long arms, touching and caressing each other.

The slow years passed away, beckoning to the children of the earth who unwillingly followed them, and the three elms grew old. Many generations of men had lived and died, and the hand of Change lay disquietingly upon the land. A railway had marred their peace and broken their solitude and the horrible din of machinery drowned the sibillant lisp of their voices. These innovations weighed upon them with exceeding heaviness, and their brows became furrowed and wrinkled, and their limbs bent and distorted, and the bright green of their leaves dull and discolored, their hands trembled as those stricken of the palsy, and they nodded feebly and without meaning.

Yet high above the discordant railway and the reverberating workshops they towered magnificently. Still they stretched out their majestic arms, and still they gave an added glory to the landscape, a culminating beauty to the verdurous earth.

At length, in the full blaze of high summer, men approached the trees and stood in their serene shade. They spoke together long and earnestly, as those who do business in merchandise, and measured them with tapes and rods. With coarse speech and rude jest they laid sacrilegious hands on the fathers of the forest, and the three elms knew that their hour had come. Sublime in their stately grace and dignity they asked no mercy, no consideration. It was sufficient that it had to be. Presently the men returned with axes with which they struck at the trees, foully and insolently. The other trees looked on in dull amazement. Blow after blow the men struck, paused to rest awhile, then smote again and again. For a space the Patriarchs gave no sign, then the wind blew upon them and they groaned, for the wind, which hitherto had assailed them in vain, now had power upon them and wrought with it grievously to their undoing. Still the men went on striking and cutting into them, deeply and cruelly, and the wind, gathering in resolution, pressed heavily and bowed their majestic heads. They swayed awhile, leaned widely, then, with a stupendous uproar of tearing wood, fell lifeless upon the earth. Side by side they lay in their calamity, even as they had stood together in their strength and beauty.

Nevertheless, it was supremely theirs to have an austere destiny, to march magnificently through the centuries, to symbolize the tragedies of the lives of men, to be the august agents and accomplices of love and sorrow, of hope and despair, of desolation and death.

Their broad, beneficent arms no longer stretched widely; their bright green leaves no longer whispered sweet secrets beneath the moon; their majestic crests no longer towered above the world. Shorn of their strength, mutilated, disfigured, and humiliated, they lay silent and sorrowful upon the moist green earth.

Presently they were borne away in carts to the railway, chained ignominiously to vile trucks, and dragged swiftly through the peaceful country to a great and turbulent city. Here they were separated. It was the last of their associated misfortunes. Through all the changes of the fateful years they had grown up together. Every joy and every sorrow, every triumph and every vicissitude, had been equally shared by them. The same benign showers had fallen upon them; the same soft winds had caressed them; the same flowers had breathed over them; the same fair children had gambolled beneath their branches; the same dews had cooled them; the same birds had slept in the shelter of their leaves. Now, in their death, they were divided; the Fates had spoken and the austere destiny of each was about to be fulfilled.

The first was taken to a large prison, and of it was builded a gibbet, whereon doomed men, haggard-eyed, were strangled. It was cast about with horror and darkness and desolation. Men passed it shudderingly, with averted eyes; women wept at the thought of it; children were not allowed to look upon it; the very hangman hurried away from its appalling presence. The lost men who were taken to it saw in its face the abandonment of hope. The light of the sun never

A Marriage of Convenience

By W. S. Maugham

I don't know why the desire seized me once, in my youth, to take a voyage on a Spanish cargo-boat. I was staying at Cadiz, with nothing in the world to do—O most delectable condition!—and going down one day to the harbor saw a rather shabby steamer loading vast bales of merchandise. I began to talk with a sailor-man who lounged idly on the quay, and learned that she was bound for Valencia, Tarragona and Tunis. The blue of the sea was as deep as the blue of the heavens, and Romance, that jade of flattering insincerity, put out a beckoning finger. Before I knew what had happened my soul was aflame with the desire for unknown lands, and when the second mate—for such I discovered was the garrulous seaman—told me they sometimes took passengers, I made up my mind to take the journey. My traps were soon gathered together, my passage booked, and next morning we started on our leisurely tour of the Spanish coast. For some time things went well enough. I spent the day reading such books as I had, and the evening playing cards with the skipper. We stopped at one port after another, loading and unloading with truly Spanish deliberation. Presently, leaving the shores of Spain, we crossed to Africa, and one morning, very early, when I got up I found that we had cast anchor in the harbor of an island off the coast of Tunis. The sun shone with dazzling brilliancy upon the white houses of a little town, and here and there tall palm-trees rose into the air. We were to stay but a few hours, for the place was not on the steamer's route; and the captain called there only by chance, to execute some commission. I had determined not to go on shore, but I know not what there was in the smiling, sunny town that exerted on me an odd fascination; the more I looked at it the greater was my desire not only to visit it, but to stay there. In all probability the immortal gods would never again bring me to that island, and I dared not risk the regrets which must be mine if I missed the present opportunity. I discussed the matter with the captain, who assured me I should only be disappointed: the town had nothing to attract travelers, and the only Europeans were the French Consul with his wife, a sergeant, and a dozen soldiers. I looked across the harbor once more, and the white houses seemed to whisper a welcome to me; I felt on a sudden that I was transported to the Arabian Nights, and this was a magic isle from which wonderful things might be expected. Hitherto my journey had been very barren of the romance I sought, for nothing could be more matter-of-fact than the cargo-boat in which for three weeks I had lived: here lived enchanted damsels singing sadly to their lutes, and the very beggars were kings fallen from their high estate. I shut my ears to the skipper's admonitions, packed my things hastily, and summoned a boat from the shore. My friends on board, thinking me mad, shook my hand, with solemn warnings that I should regret my folly, and in a quarter of an hour I found myself landed, with all my belongings, on the beach.

I was at once surrounded by a score of swarthy Arabs, who apparently discussed me and my concerns with considerable interest, and one, who spoke broken French, asked if I wished to see the Consul.

"No," I said; "I want to go to the hotel."

I confess I was a little dismayed when he answered that there was no such thing in the place, but now I would not for worlds have returned, crestfallen, to the steamer; and I asked if I could nowhere get lodgings. The Arab, with much gesticulation, talked the matter over with his friends, and presently suggested the house of a certain lady whose name I have forgotten. He shouldered my bag, and I followed him down one winding, narrow street after another till we arrived at a little white house at which he stopped. He knocked repeatedly, and at last a woman opened. When he explained what I wanted, she looked at me curiously, but in due course agreed to let me have a room. I bargained for the price and entered.

Having made myself as comfortable as possible—which was not much—I sauntered down to the shore and watched my good cargo-boat set out to sea. I was alone on a foreign island, where I knew no soul, and the weekly packet that ran between the little town and the mainland was not due for five days. Presently, while I watched the sea, smoking a cigarette, I saw my friend of the morning in conversation with a Frenchman, who, I surmised at once, was the sergeant of whom I had heard. They came up to me, and the sergeant, saluting politely, began to talk. Somewhat to my amusement, I found that he regarded me with considerable suspicion, and he asked me question after question. I did not gather the general drift of his inquiries, but answered everything readily enough.

"But frankly," he asked for the tenth time, "why have you come here at all?"

"A mere whim, cher Monsieur," I answered. "Curiosity, nothing else."

He evidently found my explanations unsatisfactory, and I cannot say that I took much trouble to make my motives clear. He informed me at last that he would report my presence to Monsieur le Consul.

"By all means," said I. "And pray add that I shall give myself the pleasure of calling on him tomorrow if my throat is not cut tonight in the unsavory den which appears to be your only substitute for a hotel."

He left me, and I spent the rest of the day in wandering about the Arab streets, looking at the people, and feeling, indeed, something of that thrill I had expected. At night my hostess provided me with food, of which it could only be said that it performed the first office of edible substances—it allayed the pangs of hunger. But beside it the dinners on the cargo-boat, and they had seemed bad enough in all conscience, were tooth-

All the World's a Stage

Our life's a play, a tragi-comic scene,
Where acts of joy and sorrow intervene;
In varied parts, each character appears,
And shifts the scenes of short revolving years.
Some act in higher stations than the rest,
But God observes who acts his part the best:
He, the great judge, their final fate decrees,
Applauds or damns them in the afterpiece,
When Death, as prompter, bids the curtain fall,
And one catastrophe concludes it all.
Of kings and beggars, cottagers and queens,
None can claim preference behind the scenes.
Act well your part and sure is your reward;
Repine not if another be preferred
To act above you in this scenic age.
All will be equal when we're off the stage.

The Spectator

When Newspapers Disagree

Evidence that the world has not spun far enough down the ringing grooves of change to be appreciably nearer the millenium than it was a year ago is supplied by the changing attitude of the newspapers toward one another and toward the graft prosecution. For months the four leading dailies worked shoulder to shoulder to help Francis J. Heney and William J. Burns accomplish their gigantic task and they studiously refrained from publishing news which would embarrass the plans of the Grand Jury. Rivalry seemed to be forgotten and all men who had the success of the campaign against corruption at heart acclaimed the unique situation of sincere co-operation in which four erstwhile enemies found themselves. To say that this admirable condition has ceased is only partly true. The four newspapers are still a unit on the larger issues of the anti-graft crusade, but the wedge of politics is beginning to force them asunder.

How the Trouble Started

The first rift in the newspaper lute which up to that time had been strummed in true harmony came when the Chronicle published the story of the trap laid by G. M. Roy for Supervisors Lonergan and Bixton. That story was known to the editors of the Call, Examiner and Bulletin, but they carefully refrained from using it because the prosecution was not yet prepared to have the calcium thrown on its thrilling supervisory drama. But the Chronicle was in a peculiar position. It did not enjoy the confidence of the prosecution, so while the Call through the improved relations existing between Rudolph and John D. Spreckels, the Examiner through J. J. Dwyer and the Bulletin through Fremont Older fully understood what was going on and sacrificed valuable news to assist Heney and Burns, the Chronicle remained uninitiate and when one of its star reporters stumbled on a "tip" which ultimately yielded the whole story of the Lonergan and Bixton confessions, it had no compunction about publishing it.

An Untimely Exposure

Had a bombshell been dropped by Abe Ruef on the shingles of the Red House where Heney and Burns have their offices it could not have created a warmer atmosphere than that which was generated about the prosecution and the newspapers which enjoyed its confidence on the morning when the Chronicle story appeared. Heney was furious; Burns was furious; the editors of the Call, Examiner and Bulletin were furious; G. M. Roy was furious, but that is another story. Some idea of the feeling excited may be drawn from a brief passage-at-words which took place that same afternoon between Heney and the Chronicle man who had obtained the "scoop." "How did you happen to smell this out?" demanded Heney with a smile that was anything but friendly when he encountered the Chronicle reporter at a session of the Grand Jury held rather unexpectedly that afternoon. "It is not difficult to track the elephantine footsteps of the prosecution," answered the undismayed newspaperman." That night the Bulletin had a denial of the Chronicle story couched in the most positive terms. Roy denied it, Burns denied it, Heney denied it and Langdon swelled the chorus. The Call and the Examiner ignored the story next morning. Of course the story was true, but it was most untimely.

Hearst Doing Politics

After that the Chronicle was inclined to be rebellious and found in the immunity promised to the supervisors the pretext for a number of articles which obliquely attacked the prosecution. These manifestations have ceased recently and the close reader of newspapers may observe that now the Chronicle is never behind, while it is sometimes a little ahead of the other papers in its news about the graft prosecution. But the trouble has broken out in another place and those who care aught about the squabbles of the journals are watching with concern the editors of the Bulletin and the Examiner reaching for each other's throats. Because William H. Langdon, who was the Examiner candidate for governor at the last election, will undoubtedly figure prominently when the political cozzettes begin casting the horoscope for the next municipal campaign, Hearst has been careful to accentuate the position which the district attorney occupies in the prosecution of the grafters. And as he is constitutionally incapable of refraining when an effective bit of politics can be done Hearst has twisted the threads of the investigation into a cord which is gradually lifting Langdon into his familiar position on a Hearst platform.

Riling the Bulletin

Besides this Hearst has unfairly claimed the whole credit for the prosecution of the municipal grafters in two Sunday editorials of the sensational Brisbane kind which were published in all the Hearst papers throughout the country. The persistent boosting of Langdon none takes exception to, for Langdon deserves the credit of doing a big thing when he appointed Heney as an assistant in his office and loaned him the machinery of the law to work with. But when to this was added the claim that the Examiner assumes responsibility for the indictments and confessions obtained so far, the gorge of at least one editor must have risen. Of the graft prosecution Fremont Older might say as did the pious Aeneas of the doings about Troy—"quorum pars magna fui." No one can forget that the Bulletin was training its heaviest fire on Schmitz and Ruef at a time when the Examiner had none but kind words for the "labor mayor." The Examiner has also seen fit to lay as much stress as possible on the fact, brought out in the Grand Jury, that the fusion campaign committee on which Fairfax Wheelan and Gavin McNab worked side by side, took money from Detweiler, the indicted bribing agent of the Home Telephone Company. The Call also has gone out of its way to kick the fusion corpse. The Bulletin, it will be recalled, was enthusiastically committed to the fusion ticket, lending it a passionate support when the other papers were inclined to be lukewarm.

That Ballot Box Story

No doubt it was merely one of those capricious freaks of chance which will occur and of which the resourceful are ever swift to avail themselves, that immediately following this accumulation of irritating circumstances Honest Blacksmith Graney implicated Editor John P. Barrett of the Hearst forces in a ballot-box stuffing transaction. Certainly the Bulletin was not slow to herald the fact that Hearst and one of his editors were about to receive the attention of the Grand Jury nor was it backward in calling reverential attention to recently uttered words of District Attorney Langdon which imply that he will not show any partiality in his distribution of true bills. All of which goes to show that the lions and the lambs of local journalism can repose peacefully side by side until the ugly specter of politics rises between them. It is just possible, of course, that the liberal and high-minded policy which informed newspaperdom at the beginning of the present prosecution may be reasserted before reprisals and recriminations become too bitter. For the sake of the great work that is still to be done and that cannot be adequately done without the harmonious co-operation of the press, it is to be devoutly wished that all their differences will be adjusted.

"The Honest Blacksmith"

In justice to Editor Barrett it should be stated that Graney's story is absolutely discredited by everybody familiar with the history of the primary election at which the Hearst forces tried to capture the Democratic machine. The services rendered by Graney in that election were rendered in expectation of winning the friendship of a newspaper and because his interests were prejudicial to the political faction against which his corrupt practices were directed. From the beginning of the graft investigation Graney has been kept very busy trying to conciliate the men behind the prosecution. This perhaps would not have been a very difficult task if the honest blacksmith had not tried at the same time to persuade Ruef that he was absolutely invulnerable to the Heney probe. Graney has an abundance of cunning but he was scarcely resourceful enough to command the confidence of both sides. He has told many stories in private which he was reluctant to repeat before the Grand Jury and his shiftiness long ago disgusted the attorneys for the prosecution. Most ludicrous is the figure that he has been cutting on the anxious seat, and the Examiner has made frequent reference to his awkward side-stepping. For all this unkind newspaper attention he has held Editor Barrett responsible, and when he told the story implicating the newspaper man in the election scandal it was to indulge his spirit of vindictiveness.

The Glorification of Langdon

Not less amusing than the antics of the honest blacksmith is the grotesque posing of District Attorney Langdon in the role of inspirer of the prosecution. Langdon, as everybody knows, made but a feeble effort to interfere with the operations of the big graft machine. He was tame enough for awhile to eat out of Schmitz's hand, and the only time that he made it quite clear that he was not a complaisant official was when he made a raid on the gamblers. That was preliminary to the launching of his gubernatorial boom. It was a fine bit of theatricism and was most effectual. It proved, at least, that Langdon was not one of the gang, that he was not sharing in the graft that was being so generously distributed. But this evidence of honesty was unaccompanied by any proof of ability or of zeal for the public interests. It bore very much the aspect of a spectacular appeal to public confidence designed to further the political interests of Mr. Langdon. Never for a moment did Mr. Langdon threaten the peace, quiet or prosperity of Abe Ruef. These are no wanton animadversions flung into print in the indulgence of a cantankerous mood. I have no prejudice against Mr. Langdon. But I feel that he occupies a very exalted position and is at this moment identified with a most beneficent movement in the interest of this community, and I think that he should realize the dignity of his official station and the seriousness of the business in hand and discourage those of his zealous friends who are actively engaged in making it appear that the prosecution of Schmitz and Ruef is nothing more than an enterprise for the glorification of a job-chaser. Those friends are unnecessarily bringing discredit on Mr. Langdon by their extravagant misrepresentations respecting his achievements.

Dwyer's Eulogy

For example the Hon. Joseph J. Dwyer, in an article signed by him, which appeared in the Chicago Examiner of March 24 says: "The whole band of boodling supervisors have been trapped by the skill of District Attorney Langdon and his assistants and the able corps of detectives whom he engaged in the work under the leadership of the famous secret service agent, William Burns." Mr. Dwyer knows that the supervisors were not trapped by Langdon. He knows that Langdon did not employ any detectives. He knows that had it not been for Rudolph Spreckels and Francis J. Heney the forces of graft would still be operating with impunity, but he credits Langdon with having taken the initiative in the present movement and he attributes the downfall of Ruef entirely to the perseverance and genius of the District Attorney. He is even so reckless in his assertions as to represent that "Langdon came right back from his stumping tour to represent the people in the selection of the new grand jury," and that it was for doing so that the grafters tried to throw him out of office, whereupon he named Heney as his chief assistant and called to his aid Burns and Rudolph Spreckels. The facts are, as Mr. Dwyer knows, that all the plans for the drawing of the grand jury and for the indictment of Schmitz and Ruef were completed before Langdon was taken into the confidence of Spreckels, Burns and Heney, and that no attempt was made to remove Langdon from office until after he had been persuaded to clothe Heney with the power to proceed against the grafters. Mr. Dwyer should assuage himself. His exultation over Langdon's achievements is difficult of justification. When Langdon ran for Governor he incurred liability of election and if he had been elected the office of district attorney would have fallen into the hands of Abe Ruef and the grafters would still be having a monkey and a parrot time.

He Wouldn't Be a Lobster

Billy Burns is perhaps the shrewdest detective in this country, but he has had his disappointments. One that rankles with him was his failure to secure a confession from Dimmick, who is now serving a term in San Quentin for stealing $30,000 from the local Mint while employed in that institution. The hiding place of that $30,000 has never been discovered, but that is not the fault of Burns. He labored hard with Dimmick to secure a confession from him, and was just on the point of success when one of his assistants, who thought he was making a shrewd move, spoiled the game. Dimmick and Burns were alone together, and the former had been worked up to the point where he was ready to tell all he knew. Just then Burns's assistant came in. He had in his hand a copy of an evening paper which contained a confession made by a man who had robbed the Selby Smelting Company of a large amount of gold. The story was spread all over the front page, and the headlines referred to the man who had confessed as a lobster. The assistant, probably with the idea that the article would have the proper psychological effect on Dimmick, laid it on the table. Dimmick picked it up and read the story with interest. Burns, who was choking with rage, knew what the result would be. When Dimmick had finished he laid the paper down, and looking across the table at Burns said, with a significant smile: "Nobody will ever get a chance to call me a lobster." From that time forth his lips were sealed.

Carter to Retire

"Just about as the sugar planters had made up their minds that Governor Carter was the man they wanted for another term as governor of Hawaii," says my Honolulu correspondent, "it was announced (unofficially, but none the less convincingly), that Carter would not be reappointed. Two years ago Carter announced that he had resigned. He went to Washington, had an interview with the President, withdrew his resignation—if he had ever tendered it—announced that he was a changed man and took up the gubernatorial burden again. The tip then was that at the suggestion of the President he was going to serve out his term of office. Last November he gave out several interviews the burden of which was 'that under certain circumstances' he might accept a second term. This was accepted by the community as an intimation that he would seek reappointment. About the same time it became known that the planters, who had not always been satisfied with him, had made up their minds that he was the most satisfactory man for the place so far as their interests were concerned and that they would use all their influence to secure his reappointment. One of the incidents accepted by the discerning as most conclusive of the attitude of the planters was the action of H. E. Cooper. About this time Cooper, who has been a perennial candidate for governor, announced that he was no longer an aspirant for the office. After continuous office holding almost from the time he arrived here fifteen or sixteen years ago until about three years ago, he retired to practice law. Since then he has been employed by planting interests in a number of cases in which his official experience was of value, notably in the recent deal by which the Island of Lanai was traded off. These employments were looked on as putting him in a position where he would know what the planters wanted, and when he announced that he was no longer an aspirant for the office of governor he was credited with knowing that the planters had fixed on another man.

A Friend of the Planters

Carter has not always been satisfactory to the planters. He is an impulsive man, and where his own interests are not involved, a man of generous impulses. After holding back for a good while he finally accepted the President's announced policy of making this an American territory instead of a planters' oligarchy, and it looked for a time as though he purposed upsetting some of the planters' plans. But his ardor cooled off, and after he had given away some remnants of public lands that included about four hundred acres of fine cane land and the site of the entire village of Waianae to the Waianae plantation, and had traded off some forty-seven thousand acres of public lands on the Island of Lanai to another opulent interest, the planters came to believe that he was not after all so anxious to bring in a white population to settle the public lands as they had feared he was, and hence their willingness to accept him as governor for another term. Now it is all off again. The conjecture is that the tip came from Washington that after his break about being willing that his daughter should marry a Japanese, he was no longer on the list of eligibles; that there would be too much opposition to his confirmation in the senate.

Probable Aspirants for the Job

Whatever the basis for the belief that he will not be reappointed, it is accepted by the community. Carter himself refuses to say anything, and there is plenty of talk about a successor. It is rather accepted as a political fact that he will have considerable to say in the selection of a successor, and J. M. Dowsett and E. Faxon Bishop are both talked of as men who are likely to get his backing. Dowsett is a part Hawaiian, but a keen, shrewd business man, wealthy, being the owner of Waianae plantation which was the beneficiary of Carter's largess when the site of the Village of Waianae was given away. He is a member of the senate, and generally well liked. Bishop is a nephew, and has always been a protege of Charles R. Bishop, now of San Francisco, and is an official of C. Brewer & Company, one of the biggest sugar agencies in the Islands. He too is a senator. He has little of the personal popularity of Dowsett. Each is thoroughly identified with the plantation interests and would probably be satisfactory to them. Secretary of the Territory A. L. C. Atkinson was for a long time looked on as Carter's political heir apparent. He it was that really inaugurated the policy of seeking to turn back the tide of orientalization by bringing in white immigrants and seeking to settle the public lands with citizen settlers. But it has been evident for some time that Carter would seek to disinherit him, though that circumstance enhanced the wide popularity throughout the Islands which Atkinson enjoys.

Our Colonial Secretary

The daily papers, in their mad scramble after graft news, neglected to mention the recent presence here of a notable man—Dean C. Worcester, Secretary of the Interior for the Philippines, and a member of the Philippines Commission. Mr. Worcester spent only a short time in the United States, but while here he conceived the idea of forming an organization with headquarters in San Francisco, the object of which will be to call attention to the Islands and their resources. This idea came about largely through his attention being called to the California Promotion Committee and the work it has been doing. He will bring the matter up immediately on his arrival in the Islands. When he went home he took a suit-case of literature issued by the Promotion Committee and its affiliated organizations throughout the state. He has already caused to be sent hither a large commercial exhibit of Philippine products, and this will shortly be thrown open to the public.

An Old Familiar Story

Mr. Worcester has been identified with the government of the Islands during the entire period of our occupancy. He is the senior member of the Commission, and probably has a wider knowledge of the archipelago as a whole than any other of our administrators. Years ago, long before Admiral Dewey made junk of the Spanish fleet, Worcester spent two years among the Islands investigating their rare fauna and flora. The result of these investigations was a general book on the Philippines which because of its tolerant and accurate views of the Islands and their affairs and its avoidance of tedious political discussion was perhaps largely responsible for his election as a member of the Commission during the early years of American occupation when it was necessary to have reprerepresentatives who were familiar with the manners and customs of the people. Since his appointment, Worcester has enlarged his knowledge of the Islands, traveling over and familiarizing himself with all districts. His collection of photographs runs into the thousands. In addition to all this, he has put through a number of important projects some of which were strenuously opposed. One of these is the Benguit road, a costly bit of highway leading from the lowlands up to high, cool mountain regions where a sort of "Simla" or summer headquarters for the Commission, civil officials or anyone else who wants a breath of fresh air has been established. Time alone will demonstrate the wisdom of the Benguit road from a financial standpoint, but it is already being pointed out as a fine sample of characteristic American political achievement, for though the estimated cost was only $75,000, it has already cost two and a half millions, and the annual cost of maintenance is not less than the original estimate of the cost of construction. However it affords our hard-worked commissioners opportunity for rest and recreation.

A Manila Editor

Another prominent resident of the Philippines came to town the other day. I refer to Frederick O'Brien, editor of the Manila Cablenews, the leading daily of the islands. Mr. O'Brien is well known to San Francisco newspaperdom but he is equally well known to the profession of half a dozen other American cities, for he is one of the most restless of representatives of the Fourth Estate. He is as familiar with the inner workings of the New York Herald office as with those of the San Francisco Chronicle, and he knows the news field of Honolulu as well as he knows the news field of Manila. O'Brien was the founder of the original San Francisco Attie. His Attie at Clay and Kearny streets was the snuggest in the city, and none was more artistic in appointments. Though he went to the Islands four years ago O'Brien never surrendered possession of his Attie, and now he mourns the loss of all his curios, bric-a-brac and paintings which were destroyed in the fire. Among the works of art were many of the salon pictures painted by his wife. O'Brien has been making a trip around the world and now is on the last leg of his journey.

A Bit of Local History

Sarah Connell writes, apropos my recent inquiry respecting the whereabouts of the flag that inspired Francis Scott Key: "I don't know where the original Star Spangled Banner is to be found, but can locate the first American flag made in California, as it is a bit of family property, made for my father, who was young and enthusiastic enough to indulge in processions when the State was admitted into the Union. It is about the only relic left now, since the Bear Flag and other original memorials were lost in the fire. Our flag is made out of the scraps which a dressmaker happened to have in her piece-bag. The red was never the proper brilliant scarlet, but more of a cherry shade. It has long since faded to pink on the exposed side. There was not enough of one kind of white to make both sides the same (the flag is double, the two pieces put together with a cording of the red), and such as it was, has taken on a cream or ivory tint. The stars are

Fashion Reigns in Oakland's House of Spring Novelties

April finds the TAFT & PENNOYER fashion display complete in all those things that rightfully have place in such an exhibition.

When our buyers returned from New York, London and Paris they had but one report to make—"we have bought everything that's correct."

Bold talk, you say; but the proof of it is here and you may judge of it.

THE TAILORED GOWNS

This week's arrivals of beautiful tailored gowns will greet you when you enter this store. Their superiority over all other gowns will at once strike you—there will be no need to explain their many good points. At no time can it be more auspicious to choose a Spring gown than now.

The individuality of these suits, the success of the designers in producing exclusive effects, the cunning of the tailors are comprehended at a glance.

Yet with all this effort to insure leadership in style the TAFT & PENNOYER prices are no higher than is often paid for less satisfactory garments in other stores.

of linen, and the whole is hand-sewed in cotton thread, most likely because there was no sewing-silk to be had. The history, as far as I know, is this: My father was the chief messenger of the Adams Express Company, and they wanted to be represented in some special manner in the parade, and hit upon having their "man" carry an American flag. It seems a childish device now, but evidently was an innovation then, for when they came to look for what they wanted, nothing was to be had. All the national flags procurable were either ships' flags or such as were suited for decorative purposes or to be hoisted on flagstuffs. The manager of the company set out to have one made to order, and was "up against it" again, for there were neither regalia-makers nor materials to be had for the purchase, much less the asking. By some means or other he was directed to his seamstress who did her best with what she had, and the result was a flag just a yard in length, though some of the stripes are pieced out. The manager was Daniel Haskell, then a man of wealth, and he paid a fifty-dollar slug for his prize. My father had the pleasure or honor of carrying it and after the parade it was given to him as a souvenir. I never heard the name of the maker. Later on, when the Adams Bank went to eternal smash, some time in the middle fifties, I think, Haskell sacrificed his private fortune trying to bolster up the concern, but the express company went down with it and Haskell died in the Alms House."

The Library Loafer

The following letter of complaint is of some interest: "Dear Spectator—For years past, in fact since the establishment of free public reading rooms, the eastern papers have from time to time deprecated the fact that they were to a great extent only public lounging places. San Francisco, not having had the lesson of experience, could afford to neglect the hints and warnings, but she cannot do so, any longer, for though the genus tramp is still missing, it is evident that we are developing a new species, the library tramp. Every day in the week and all day long the branches of the city library are thronged with men and half-grown boys who should be employed at some useful occupation, but who find the warm stove, the shelter and the newspapers and periodicals an unresisted if not irresistible temptation. There is nothing of the scholar or student about them, nor are they of a class indulging in an occasional 'spree' of reading, but they bear all the marks of having settled down to a long debauch of physical and intellectual loafing. The probabilities are that a goodly percentage are products of the refugee camps, trained, during the past eleven months to a system of shirking every duty, content if their bodies are warmed and their stomach filled, to half doze through existence, even without their cigarettes. A new magazine scarcely finds place in the rack before it is seized upon, and by the time the librarians and assistants find a few moments to restore some semblance of order it is dog-eared and dirty, with every chance that the cover has been removed so that the next reader must pry into its center in order to discover the brand and examine each page to learn the contents. Every chair is occupied, every table littered, and those who display every mark of illiteracy are found in possession of the reviews and quarterlies which they would not read under any conditions, but which enable them to retain their places by a show of occupation. It used to be said and not without reason, that our public libraries were but clearing houses for novels, and patronized only by women and school children, but it is a brave and bold woman who can penetrate today. The Salvation Army discovered, years ago, the temptation which free reading rooms placed in the way of the weak-willed who, though lacking the more robust inclination for saloons and pool rooms, were equally as far from initiative in the opposite direction, and made it their rule that recreation halls and reading rooms should be closed during working hours. No one will be so captious as to deny the right of men to look over the daily papers or to read a magazine article which interests them. No one can object to the occasional hour in a library, but to spend the whole day and every day dawdling, and dodging work, is another story altogether. The library habit is just as much to be condemned as the saloon habit. Both are exemplifications of idleness and uselessness."

—A Reader.

The Hebbard Investigation

I hear that the committee appointed by the Bar Association to investigate certain charges against Superior Judge Hebbard is having a hard time of it. There is gossip galore, but no evidence. Attorneys and newspaper reporters who have been free with their tongues in the matter are clams when it comes to making a statement in writing for the benefit of the committee. Yet they do not hesitate to say in private that the Judge seemed of late to be more interested in John Barleycorn than in legal questions. There is no doubt that his conduct has been quite erratic on the bench as well as in private life, but it is not easy to procure evidence against him, for he has the sympathy of all that know him. Even those that deprecate the most the lapses to which his in-

Breezes That Make Men Crazy

Chicago scientists have discovered that crime is inspired by the East wind, which fills people with distress and madness. It breeds influenza and a desire for suicide. It creates brain storms, under the influence of which wind-crazed people go out and butcher their neighbors. It influences the burglar, who, when the East wind blows, can think of naught but climbing porches, jimmying doors, and looting silver chests. When the wind is in the East the footpad grasps his trusty blackjack and lurks in shadows waiting for people with well-filled purses. It is a terrible thing, this East wind, under the influence of which bank presidents juggle funds and clerks rob safes in order that they may play the races. Criminals rich enough to hire eminent counsel will have a new defense. "Your Honor," the attorney will say, "I propose to prove that on the day my client murdered his entire family—which act we are willing to admit—there was an East wind blowing under the influence of which he could not resist the impulse to butcher his relatives. Science will support me in this." Then will be a time for experts. Weather men will be called upon to testify as to whether the wind on that day was really from the East, or was nor' nor'-east—which would make the difference between hanging and going with an unstretched neck. And windy scientists would revel in the opportunity to air their knowledge. This wind theory is likely to receive support in San Francisco, especially if the streets go unsprinkled much longer. Any one who has battled against our trade winds, which bear blinding clouds of dust, ashes and debris, will be willing to believe in the theory of breezes that "madden to crime."

They Water Their Butter

A Eureka correspondent writes me that some of the creameries of Humboldt County are getting tangled up with the pure food law. Watered milk is something that we city people are perfectly familiar with, but it seems that the foxy creamery man also waters his butter. Of course one of the component parts of butter is water, but the new pure food law provides that it shall not be more than sixteen per cent. All over that the creamery man must pay the government for at market value—the price of a pound of butter for every pound of water over the prescribed amount. There is a fine besides. This water-working business has become a specialty at some of the creameries. The more water a butter-maker could get into the butter, the higher his wages. Some of the expert ones could work in as high as thirty per cent. With butter at twenty-five cents a pound, there was quite a profit in this extra fourteen per cent of water, especially in a creamery that was making half a ton of butter a day. The government has taken cognizance of all this, and one of the big creameries of Humboldt County has been stung for about $15,000, which includes the fines imposed. But it does not intend to yield without a fight, and has sent a representative down here to see if he cannot adjust things. The enforcement of this law means a loss to the dairyman as well as to the creamery owner. The dairymen are paid for their milk according to the amount of butter fat in it. But there has been so much competition among the creameries that they have been paying more than the milk is really worth, depending for their profit on the water they could work into the butter—the water that you and I have been buying for the benefit of the oppressed farmer. On the front steps of any country general merchandise store you can find a bunch of whiskered oracles who have resolutions for all governmental and financial problems. They know just what should be done to the trusts, and are loud in their denunciations of corporations that water stocks. But they seem to see no harm in watering their butter.

Another "Rumpus" at the U. C.

The Prytannean Society of the University of California has been caught in the tide of discontent which is sweeping over the college campus. The Prytannean is an honor society to which the most prominent girls in college belong and they were instrumental in recently founding a hospital where students could receive medical attention at a minimum cost. The hospital is in the charge of Dr. Rheinhard who has long been connected with the university. Now it is whispered that the founders of the hospital are highly displeased with the doctor's management of affairs and as the medico refuses to comply with their wishes there is a lot of tongue-wagging in the college town and the gossips are alert for another lively college row. Evidently the bird of ill omen is nesting on the college housetops, for petty strife and scandal seem to hold high carnival in the halls of higher education. Before one "rumpus" has been given decent burial by the public some new scandal bubbles to the surface.

A Noted Chinese Exile

The local branch of the Chinese Educational Society is preparing to give Kang Yu Wei a big reception on his arrival, for Wei has been heard from after a long absence. It is said that he recently arrived in New York from Europe and is coming hither. Wei was formerly a resident of our Chinatown, and it was here that he started the Chinese Reform Association of which he is still president. He is now one of the most conspicuous figures in Chinese affairs. For more than twenty years he has been an exile from China with a price on his head, and to keep that head on his shoulders he has found it necessary to make frequent changes of scene. He has wandered all over the world, but during all the period of his wandering he has kept in touch with his country and one by one have the reforms which he agitated been woven into the fabric of Chinese national policy. In 1898 he was in favor near the throne. Indeed he had the complete confidence of the young Emperor, who was induced by his zealous and patriotic mentor between June 11 and September 15 to promulgate twenty-six decrees announcing reforms of the most revolutionary character in the policy and government of China. A week after his last decree the Emperor was swept aside by the Dowager Empress, Kang was a fugitive and several of his colleagues had been executed.

A Prophet Without Honor

This great Celestial was right in his ideas of the needs of China and of the reforms the empire required; but the hour had not quite come. He was more zealous than judicious; he was precipitate when patience and caution would have served him better. He admitted the following year that he had been too fast. With a price on his head he has always credited the Dowager Empress with liberal tendencies, though she believed the time was not ripe for radical political changes. The world now sees that eminent woman in a rather different light from that in which she appeared when she suppressed the Emperor and encouraged the Boxers. There is evidence now that she believed reformatory measures were absolutely necessary, but they should be carried out slowly without startling the country by a large programme of innovation; and she encouraged the Boxers not because she expected to drive foreign influence out of China, but because,

Spring's New Costumes

Surely time now to approach in earnest the subject of a gown selection for the new season. May take a little more time than in past seasons—there is so much more that is novel and stylish. But this is an additional guarantee that you will find just what you seek, just that particular effect that you have already decided you want.

Really, the guides of Fashion should have given this season's beautiful styles some new names. To talk of Etons, Pony Suits, Jacket Suits and the like does not do justice to the handsome gowns that we are now displaying. The general principles of these popular models are followed, but that is all.

The mixtures are new, the colors are new, the trimming designs are new—there is a new satisfaction in every detail.

The new season's Tailored Suits present a choice of all the new solid colors, the very best only of the novelty mixtures, checks and plaids. The materials are Voiles, Panamas, Broadcloths and novelty weaves.

A close inspection of any suit will easily determine the fact that our values are exceptional, compared with our prices.

alarmed by the encroachments of the Powers upon Chinese soil, she believed the Boxer uprising might convince the Occident that it would cost more than it was worth to violate the territorial integrity of the empire. The seed sown by Kang and his party is already bearing fruit. The reforms which he induced the Emperor to announce are the very measures that have been proclaimed by the Government of China. The education abroad of picked students preparatory to taking official positions, the abolition of classical essays as a part of civil service examinations, the study of Western science, legal procedure, administrative methods, systems of military drill and organization, the translation of scientific books and the opening of schools to use them as texts are all among the reforms announced in the Emperor's decrees. Some of the remarkable innovations now seen in China were not included in the Emperor's programme of 1898. The Reform Association of which Kang Yu Wei is the head has a membership of 3,000,000.

Passing of Mrs. Mary Greet

Mrs. Mary Sandelande Greet, third cousin of Empress Eugenie, and a lineal descendant of James the First of Scotland, passed away at Pacific Grove last week after an illness of many months. Mrs. Greet was the granddaughter of Lord Torphi, who was Premier of Scotland. Born in Scotland, she came with her parents to the United States in 1830. After living for two years in New York, the family moved to Canada, where she married Richard Greet, whose people have been in the British Navy since 1600. Mrs. Greet had a very modest and unassuming nature, although she was a deep student and had a surprising knowledge of the history and politics of every country. She often said that a woman's name should appear in print but three times during her life—at her birth, on her wedding day and at her death. Mrs. Greet was the aunt of Ben Greet and leaves two sons, Alexander and Richard Greet, and two daughters, Miss Emma Sandelande Greet and Mrs. T. C. Innes, who lives abroad. Her three granddaughters and Miss Greet were with her at the time of her death. Mrs. Greet desired that after she had passed away her body should be laid beside that of her late husband's in Guelph, Canada, and Miss Greet has already started on that sad mission.

Mrs. James Lenox Banks, Lenox Banks, Miss S. B. Colt and Miss Jane B. Colt, all of New York, are now at Del Monte.

Other New Yorkers there at present are Mr. and Mrs. James Foster, Mrs. A. P. Fitch, Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Mard, Miss Wilkington, Mrs. G. A. Spaulding, Miss Spaulding, Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Lovejoy, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Rice Jr., Mrs. Mabel Rice, Dr. and Mrs. C. McBurney, Miss Howard, Harry S. Parker, Francis M. Weld, C. L. Barstow, A. C. Schuyler, M. C. Burrell, W. S. Myers, Lambert Myers, W. Carey Taylor, Howard Agnew Johnston and Esmonde Whitman.

Mrs. J. G. Kittle, Mrs. H. Sherman, wife of Dr. Sherman, and the two children, Mrs. B. H. Dibblee and J. Anderson were at Del Monte for the week end.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Marx (Miss Reine Weill) are enjoying honeymoon days at Del Monte.

There will be a grand concert in the Pompeian Garden at Tait's on the evening of April 18 to celebrate the anniversary of the rise of the new San Francisco.

Why the Marriage is Delayed

There has been a great deal of speculation over the announcement that Anita Harvey's nuptials have been delayed. Mrs. Harvey and Anita are still in New York, and a friend there writes me Anita is very ill and society need not look under the rose for any other reason for the postponement. She is suffering from the effects of an unusually severe cold which left her ear impaired and she is being treated by some famous Eastern specialists. Her wedding to Oscar Cooper, which was to take place on April 17, will probably be a June affair. Owing to a difference in religious belief the wedding was to be a comparatively small affair—only two hundred guests were to receive cards. But as the Harvey social position is all wool and two yards wide, the list of invited guests was skimmed from the very cream of society. People had already begun to preen their feathers for the event and a number of wedding presents have been sent, so the necessary postponement is a disappointment to their friends as well as to the bride and groom.

Martin Family History

Miss Genevieve Walker of Philadelphia, who is a cousin of the Harvey girls, will come West with Mrs. Harvey and Anita as soon as the latter is able to travel. She will divide her time between the Harvey home and Mrs. Eleanor Martin's residence. She is a granddaughter of the dowager leader of society, so her social success is assured. The ramifications of the Martin family are a Chinese puzzle to those whose memory does not go back to the "Foreword" of the social history of this city by the Western sea. Mrs. Martin had children by her first husband, Mr. Harvey, and when she married Mr. Martin he was a widower with a young daughter of his own. Mrs. Martin launched her in society and arranged a brilliant match for her but she disposed of these well meant plans by quietly slipping away and marrying a man of her own choice. Her husband hailed from Portland, Oregon, and they went there to live. The marriage proved a very happy one but the young wife did not long survive the birth of her only son. When Mr. Martin died a large share of his estate was left to this child. This young man is even less known in San Francisco society than the Walker branch of the family.

Gossips Still Guessing

Insistent Rumor which brackets the names of Genevieve Harvey and Harry Stetson will have to put on its guessing cap and await developments. The clairvoyant matchmakers who have insisted that this engagement will be announced at the Harvey-Cooper wedding must let their curiosity cool its heels now that the wedding day has been postponed. Personally

I hail from Missouri whenever a gossip whispers in my ear that Genevieve Harvey is "really, truly" engaged. I preserved the same "show me" attitude toward the now defunct rumor that Emily Wilson would spring an engagement surprise at the wedding of her sister Charlotte to George Cadwalader. I should not be surprised to hear that both of these charming girls have capitulated to Cupid but I fancy the match-makers are not in the secret of announcement dates.

Society's Forthcoming Parade

Although the Easter dress parade long ago became a derelict, every year bonnets and sonnets are aired in the papers. As a matter of fact, really smart people no longer don purple and fine linen on that day. Not one of the fashionable Blingumites appeared at Easter service in the bright new trappings of spring. They were all scrupulously careful to wear gowns and hats that would belie the Easter fallacy. Even now very few fashionables are wearing summer headgear and the few new chapeaux that I have noticed are all black affairs. Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels is wearing a lovely big, befeathered black hat with her smart black and white walking frock. It is the most becoming hat I have ever seen on this handsome young matron. Mrs. Gus Taylor is also wearing a stunning black hat—a conspicuously chic affair. However not until the opening of the Fairmont Hotel will full blown spring finery make its appearance. At the charity fete on the 16th and the dinner on the 19th one will see the very latest in gowns and hats, for society is going to make a dress parade of these affairs. Among those who will be dinner hosts on the 19th are Miss Jennie Blair, Edward M. Greenway, the Parker Whitneys, the Herbert Moffats and a number of other society leaders.

Mrs. Vanderbilt's Short Visit

Society people who had hoped to entertain Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt Sr. are grievously disappointed over her determination to spend but one day—April 20—in San Francisco. Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who met Mrs. Vanderbilt while she was visiting in New York, had planned to give a dinner in her honor. Mrs. Vanderbilt is traveling west in her private car and has a dozen guests with her. Since all interstate railway passes have been abolished full fare must be paid for every person riding in a private car, which means that only people affected with sudden rushes of generosity to the head will hereafter fill their private cars with guests. A Milwaukee millionaire who passed off his friends as maids and valets and took them on a jaunt in his car is now being investigated—which proves that even the muchly-moneyed resort to questionable devices to evade this irksome law. few San Franciscans own private cars they do not particularly feel the burden of the new rule. Jennie Crocker has her own car but evidently she does not screw the lid on her coffers very tightly, for right after the law was passed she took a party of eight to Mexico.

Still Slashing Fine Gowns

The "skirt slasher" is stalking the land again and the satin shod step gingerly these days for fear of running into his knife. A week or two ago he made his presence known on the Oakland ferry boat by surreptitiously following several ladies who were returning from a tea on the other side of the bay, and at the opportune moment, zip! he slashed a skirt from knee to hem. I was told that the lady whose gown was thus ruined was Mrs. Herbert Law, but as she made no outcry over the affair the man escaped.

Has a Sartorial Brain Storm

The particular brand of "brain storm" which sweeps over this fellow's gray matter carves sartorial destruction in its wake and the police should make concerted action to capture him. Several months ago he terrified the smartly gowned by slashing skirts right and left but suddenly he disappeared and it was thought that he had departed for other fields where chiffons wave as proudly as here. But evidently he is once more abroad and is as difficult to catch as a slippery grafter.

Silk Lined Society Nervous

It is patent that the man has a crooked philosophy which has unsettled his reason. The fact that he does not slash at shabby or even moderately fine apparel proves that he has a distorted socialistic viewpoint. That some of us must travel through life in "rags, and some in bags, and some in velvet gowns" does not appeal to his sense of justice and so he goes about knifing the velvet gowns. Silk lined society will rustle more contentedly when he is captured.

Miss Extravagance Being Disciplined

Several smart shopkeepers, modistes and milliners were notified this week that a very prominent and wealthy matron would no longer be responsible for her sister's debts. The young lady is one of the most popular girls in society and is always very smartly gowned. Her sister's husband is a very rich man and when her creditors became too insistent the young lady would pass her bills up to her married sister, who would make the rounds and pay up. So of course the young woman was given unlimited credit by the shopkeepers. But this year her bills overstepped her sister's complacent generosity and she is being disciplined into economy.

Bessie Bowie In Paris

Bessie Bowie begins her professional career late this Spring. I hear she has been singing in the drawing rooms of her friends in Paris during the past winter and has made considerable money doing so. She expects to sing in London during the season and will probably make her debut at Whitelaw Reid's or Lady Cheylesmore's. Lady Cheylesmore, who was Miss French of New York City, is one of the most influential patrons of music in the London smart set, and she has brought out many American song-birds in her drawing-room. She is popular with vocal debutantes for the reason that she always pays for the privilege of having them sing, whereas many of the London hostesses consider that the singer is sufficiently paid by the prestige she gains by singing her first songs in their exclusive drawing-rooms. Another San Francisco singer who will probably rival Miss Bowie in London this Spring is Pearl Ladd who made her drawing-room debut in London last season. Miss Ladd is ambitious for an operatic career and probably will return to the United States this year. Miss Bowie is also an aspirant for histrionic honors but as her health is not robust she will probably not attempt it. In Paris she recently appeared in a concert given by Mrs. Younger of this city.

The Fairmont Promenade Concert

The big event of the week, in fact the biggest charitable event in the history of San Francisco will be the promenade concert, under the direction of Dr. H. J. Stewart, at the Fairmont Hotel, on Tuesday evening, April 16th. The concert is for the benefit of The San Francisco Nursery for Homeless Children, The Doctors' Daughters and San Francisco Polyclinic, and will doubtless attract the largest and most representative assemblage since the fire. Among those taking part in the musical program will be the Stanford and Berkeley Glee Clubs, the De Koven Glee Club, The Swedish Singing Society, the Fairmont Hotel Orchestra, Mrs. Bermingham, Miss Helen Heath, Miss Camille Frank, Mrs. Charles Camm, Mrs. Markt, Miss Virginia Pierce, and Mr. Romeo Frick. The arrangements for the concert have been made by a joint committee of ladies from the three charities interested, of which Mrs. M. H. de Young is the head.

The following registered at Byron Hot Springs during the past week: From San Francisco, Mrs. E. H. Davenport, Mr. and Mrs. R. M. Steele, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Jewett, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. W. Pike, Dr. L. D. Bacigalupi, Mr. and Mrs. Dixwell Hewett. Oakland, Captain and Mrs. I. Z. Thayer. Blair, Nev., M. L. Effinger.

McKee Has Caught On

"Robt." McKee who is well known in this city has become quite a figure in the artistic life of New York City. He is now established as one of the chief interior decorators of the metropolis. His studio teas are famous in certain circles and one is always sure to meet interesting people there. Mr. McKee is a personal friend of Clyde Fitch. He planned the furnishings of one of the most elaborate rooms in the playwright's house.

Sauret Honors Landsberger

Mr. Nat Landsberger is being felicitated by his friends on the great honor conferred on him recently by his old teacher, the famous Emile Sauret, the news of which was received a few days ago. The great violinist has dedicated a beautiful composition "Andante et Caprice de Concert op. 67 to the local favorite. Sauret is at present in Geneva, Switzerland. His exquisite playing doing his engagement in this city a year ago is remembered with keen pleasure by music lovers.

The Frank McComases are in Greece.

The first recital of La Prova Club at Calvary Presbyterian Church which took place Thursday evening occurred too late to be reviewed in this week's issue.

The last of the dances for this season of the Friday Evening Dancing Club took place April 5 at the Paris Tea Garden. The attendance was very large, many guests being asked by the members on this occasion. The club has proven itself a great favorite among the younger set, thanks to the kind interest of its patronesses, Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Mrs. Louis Monteagle, Mrs. Geo. Ashton, Mrs. Potter Langhorn and Mrs. Geo. Moore. A charming dance was given last Thursday night at the Paris Tea Garden for the members of the young set who will soon make their bow to society. The affair was arranged by the Misses Slack, Miss Elva de Pue, Miss Frances Martin, Miss Marie Bullard and Misses Wheeler. A dainty supper was served after the dance and the young people spent a most enjoyable evening. The patronesses receiving the guests were Mrs. Edgar de Pue, Mrs. John Martin, Mrs. E. Bullard and Mrs. Chas. Slack.

The Severn has just scored another triumph by the addition of a very excellent male quartet to its many fetching attractions. The best proof of its exceptional success is in the smart people seen dining there right along.

A very popular Chicago man who has been many times at Del Monte was welcomed back last week. C. T. Boynton is fond of trout fishing and probably will remain until May so that he may have a chance at some of the sparkling beauties at the Rancho Del Monte, which has one of the best trout streams in the country. With Mr. Boynton is Major I. M. Bean of Milwaukee.

Petschnikoff and His Individuality

A certain cachet of old world art for art's sake pervaded the three concerts of Alexander Petschnikoff, the young Russian violinist and his artiste wife, and the mere excellence of the playing alone was not responsible for this atmosphere. Petschnikoff is the most unvirtuoso like of the great violinists, for though his mechanical skill is amply sufficient to enable him to play such compositions as the formidable Bach Chaconne with consummate technical perfection it is the exquisite musical beauty of his interpretations, the exotic charm of his Cossack temperament that make him a distinct and individual figure in the violin world. Practically every one of the great violinists, barring only Joachim and Burmester, has visited San Francisco, and each has given us his version of the Wieniawski D minor Concerto, and yet with all that array of precedent, who will be able to forget Petschnikoff's rendition of it, the indescribable and haunting sweetness of his tone, the subtle charm of his romance. Likewise the Mendelssohn Concerto, probably the most played of any violin concerto, was invested with renewed freshness by Petschnikoff, whose spontaneous warmth in the Allegro and Molto Apassionata was irresistible. The numbers for two violins presented by Mr. and Mrs. Petschnikoff revealed to us a new order of musical enjoyment, for we have never before had an opportunity of hearing these fine compositions rendered by artists of such calibre as this unique young couple. Mrs. Petschnikoff's playing is in such perfect accord with that of her husband that often the individuality of the instruments was indistinguishable and naturally the perfection of ensemble was absolute. Their Bach and Spohr numbers were hardly less novelties to us than the Suite of Zilcher, a German of pronouncedly modern tendencies. A most interesting composer, this Zilcher, one of the very few moderns who have real melodic invention, and it seemed a pity that the Petschnikoffs did not give us the Suite in its entirety instead of only two movements. The very small attendance at these concerts would indicate a most lamentable indifference to music on the part of San Franciscans were it not that the lateness of an unusually perturbed season, i. e., calamity times, gives us an excuse with which to atone for our delinquent patronage of such high class art. Mr. Greenbaum, by the bye, who persists in bringing us season after season the very best artists of the world in spite of occasional financial loss to himself, is really entitled to more consideration on our part, for he has kept faith with us far in excess of our deserts, and but for his personal enjoyment of the music he imports westward we of the musicianly ilk would probably be much less well plied with the contemporary caviare of our art.

"The Tenderfoot" at the American

Commencing with the matinee on Sunday, April 14, and continuing for two weeks the San Francisco Opera Company will present at the American Theatre Richard Carle's great comic opera success, "The Tenderfoot." It is universally acknowledged that this is one of the best of our native productions in comic opera. The locale of its action is the wild and woolly West along the Texas frontier. The book is filled to the covers and overflowing with good wholesome comedy. Among the musical gems that never fail to score big hits are "Marriage is a Lottery," "A Gay Lothario," "A Soldier of Fortune," "I'm a Peaceable Party," "My Alamo Love," "Adios," "The Tortured Thomas Cat," "Fascinating Venus," "Only a Kiss" and "Marriage Bells." Aida Hemmi has recovered from her recent illness and returns to the cast in the role of "Marian," the part in which she scored so strongly at the Tivoli Opera House. George Kunkel will be the lovable old professor, and Teddy Webb the boisterous Sergeant Barker. Mr. Haydn will play the gallant captain of the Texas Rangers who wins and tames the wilful Marian. Mr. Wallerstedt will play the part of Honest John the gambler, Miss Leicester, Flora Jane Fibbey the authoress; Mr. Rogers, Hop Lee; Ruby Norton, Patsy the waif; Mr. Stokes, Mr. Mills and Mr. Farrell, the officers of the Rangers, and the ladies and gentlemen of the chorus in the roles of Cowboys, Cowgirls, Texas Rangers, Mexicans, Bridesmaids, Soldiers and Indians.

Annie Russell, who has always been seen in the past in sweet and girlish roles, has gone in the opposite direction this season and as Puck in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," in which she will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre, the fortnight beginning April 29, she appears in a grotesque makeup. This step has proved to be a distinctive artistic success for the actress who has made many sacrifices to the cause of art.

Henrietta Crosman will have three plays in her repertoire when she appears at the Van Ness Theatre a few weeks hence.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The program for the week beginning this Sunday matinee has for a top-liner the Fadettes Woman's Orchestra of Boston, twenty-two in number, whose conductor is the clever musician Caroline B. Nichols. The musical ability of this splendid organization has apparently no limit. Its members are equally at home in Sousa's rattling "Semper Fidelis March," von Suppe's "Pique Dame" Overture; the sextette from Lucia, the allegro moderato movement from Schubert's "Unfinished Symphonic," the sparkling Caprice by Epinossa and Tobane's rollicking humorous and descriptive piece, "Coney Island in the Old Days." The Fadettes' imitation of a German band is deliciously comical and their paraphrases on Seidi's Orchestra and Gilmore's band are capital. Louise Agoust and her company will present a French vaudeville bit called Mlle. Foulard. Mlle. Agoust is a very beautiful woman and a most skillful juggler. Cartmell and Harris, one of the cleverest teams in vaudeville will make their San Francisco debut in an artistic singing and dancing specialty. Mr. Cartmell both sings and dances well, and Miss Harris is described as a danseuse such as poets write about; pretty, petite, graceful and airy. William Morrow and Miss Schellberg, clever singers, mimics and portrayers of life on the plains, complete the list of new people. The hold-overs are Ferguson and Mack, Dorothy Drew, Brockman and the Phillip Sisters and the wonderful Bellong Brothers. There will also be new Orpheum Motion Pictures.

The Colonial to Produce "Friends"

For the week beginning Monday night, April 15, the Colonial Stock Company will be seen in Milton Royle's successful four-act comedy-drama "Friends," the play in which the author himself scored such a big hit when it was first produced. "Friends" is an intensely interesting play of American life in New York. Monday night will also mark the local debut of Morgan Wallace, the new leading man engaged by Manager Kurtzig to replace Wilfrid Roger, who is now starring in "Salome." Mr. Wallace has played with some of the

Florence Roberts in a New Play

Florence Roberts is to offer for the approval of San Francisco theatregoers, at the Novelty Theatre, next Monday night a play entirely new to this city and one which has but lately received its premier. The actress has in this play, "Maria Rosa," as strong and virile a work as has been seen in years on the American stage. "Maria Rosa" is in three acts and its author, Angel Guimera, well known by his other work, "Marta of the Lowlands," has furnished a plot at once interesting, well conceived and carried out by a number of cleverly drawn characters. The title role as played by Miss Roberts holds the interest of the audience at all times and her story of love and revenge is surrounded by a picturesque stage setting. The leading male role, that of the treacherous Ramona, will be played by Thurlow Bergen, while Chas. Kent will surely prove an immediate success in the part of

At The New Alcazar

The New Alcazar Stock Company will make its first appearance in a farcical piece next week, when Leo Detrichstein's "All on Account of Eliza" will be presented. The theme of this piece is the puritanical prejudice of a rural community. It is inspired, in this instance, by a school teacher who outwits her tormentors and marries the son of the President of the School Board. The piece abounds in humorous situations and it is not without sentimental interest.

Miss Laura Lang, the leading lady of the company, will appear to especial advantage, it is said, in the role of the city school teacher for comedy is her forte and she has not as yet had a real opportunity to demonstrate that fact at the Alcazar. Bertram Lytell, the handsome leading man is cast for the part of Walter Hochstuhl, the successful lover.

John B. Maher, the comedian and the great favorite in the days of the old O'Farrell street house, will be seen in the first real "fat" part he has had since Belasco and Mayer threw open the doors of the new theatre. As Frank Hochstuhl, president of the village school board, he has ample scope for his powers of fun making. Hochstuhl is an eccentric German-American with a delicious dialect. Louis Mann made the part famous but the admirers of Mr. Maher believe that he will fill the role to equal advantage.

Lillian Russell will be the stellar attraction to appear at the Van Ness Theatre one week from Monday.

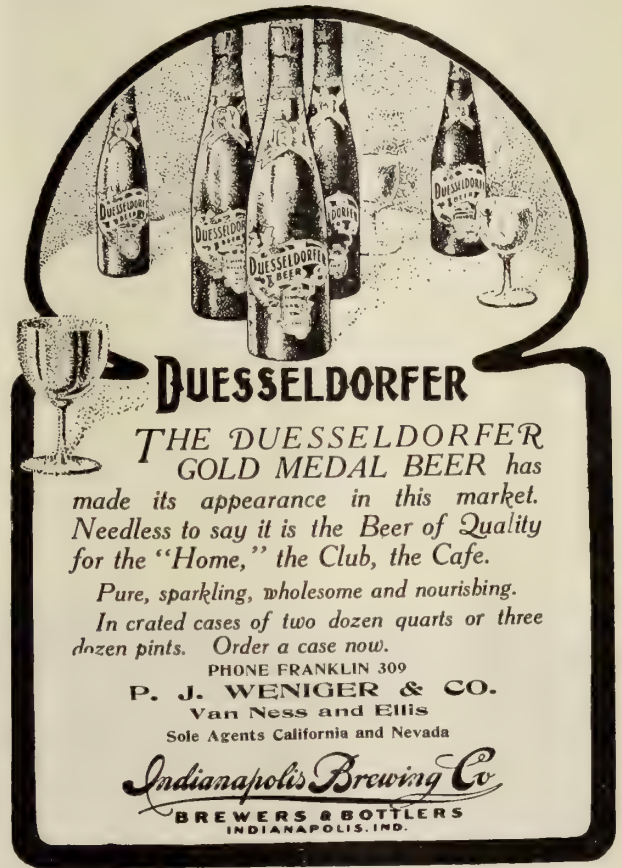

Florence Roberts will produce "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson" during the fourth and last week of her engagement at the Novelty Theatre. This is probably the actress's greatest comedy hit.

Bright Production of "The Cingalee"

"The Cingalee," produced on a very elaborate scale will be the attraction at the Van Ness Theatre commencing next Monday night. Tropical isles, gorgeous scenery, rich costumes, complicated plots, involving natives as innocent as children and rolling in wealth for the background. In this new musical comedy interest centers about Nanoya, who is half English and half Cingalee. She has been married at the age of four to a native noble, but runs away and falls in love with an English tea planter. She is found by her husband and carried off. The stage is filled with natives and visitors, who get into a wonderful wrangle that supplies the writer of the book with several subplots and the auditors with much amusement. The cast includes all the excellent members of the large company. Genevieve Finlay will be heard in the title role of the piece while Sam Collins will appear as E. Z. Breeze, a comedy role full of fun making. Melville Stewart, Hallyn Mostyn, Harold Vizard, Grace Gresham, Viola Kellogg are among those cast to special advantage.

Lillian Russell is to play a special engagement limited to one week at the Van Ness Theatre commencing Monday night, April 22. Miss Russell has been appearing this season with pronounced success in straight comedy without music and her play called "The Butterfly" is credited with having had the stamp of approval placed upon it at the very first performance.

Chicago Symphony Concerts This Week

The festival of melody to be offered us this week by Will Greenbaum through the medium of the famous Chicago Symphony Orchestra and its renowned conductor, Alexander Von Fielitz, will probably attract the biggest concert audiences of the season. The first concert of this brilliant aggregation will be given Friday evening at Christian Science Hall. The second evening concert will be given at the same place this Saturday evening, April 13. Attractive programmes have been arranged for both affairs. Saturday evening Raff's "Leonore" Symphony, Hamish McCunn's overture, "Land of Mountain and Flood," and a waltz by Glazounow will attract many. The soloists will be E. C. Towne, tenor, Miss De Selem, contralto, and Mr. Foerstel, violinist.

The first Saturday afternoon orchestral concert ever given at the Greek Theatre, Berkeley, will be the one given by this organization. This will afford an opportunity for the thousands who cannot attend the Thursday concerts to hear one of the Greek Theatre concerts. Take the 1:20 p. m. Key Route or Broad Gauge from San Francisco. The programme will be a glorious one, including Beethoven's greatest symphony, "The Eroica," Tannhauser Overture, a "Suite" by Von Fielitz, a grand selection from "Die Walkure."

The last concert will be given Sunday afternoon at the new and commodious Van Ness Theatre. This will be a genuine "Novelty" concert. Important works will be played here for the first time. Prices are moderate, ranging from $1.50 down to 75 cents. On Sunday the box office will be open at the Van Ness Theatre from 10 a. m.

Idora Park

"Wang" is attracting large crowds to Idora Park, and it looks as if that popular place would permanently be the home of light opera in Oakland. It is well worth taking a trip over to see the splendid performance, visit the fine skating rink and enjoy a day's outing.

more fell upon it; no longer did it hearken to the sound of laughter and song; not once again did the pure air of heaven whisper its benison over its head. It stood silent, in terrible solitude, shunned, feared, and abhorred, wet with the bitter tears of hopeless men.

Yet, since it stood as the dread symbol of human justice, since by its means was carried out the due punishment of sin, and since it alone heard the last whisper of dying men, its destiny was austere.

The second was purchased by a shipwright, and of it was fashioned a fishing-boat. It was dedicated to the high office of Toil, and by night and by day, in summer and winter, sunshine and rain, wind and bitter sleet, it sailed the sea, spoiling it of its treasure of food, doing battle with it valiantly for ever. It was the home of lonely men, going with them where-soever they went, protecting them from the violence of the tempest and the unreasoned raging of the sea. It carried for them that which they perilously wrested from the clutch of the waters, and they put their trust in it, placing their lives in its keeping, loving it. In no wise did it betray their sublime faith, for, when at length, after long years of patient labor, borne always without anger and without complaint, the might of the sea was greater than it could withstand, and the wild rush of the wind swifter than it could out-flee—when, on a tempestuous night, its strength failed and the sea conquered, it perished with them. Together they went down into the uttermost deeps of the sea, lying cold and forgotten in the hiding-place of the great waters.

Yet, since it performed its task nobly and without hope of reward, since women blessed it and men trusted to it not in vain, and since, at the end, it perished without fear and undeserving of reproach, its destiny was austere.

The third and last elm was hurried away at night to the most squalid part of a squalid town, where dwelt an old man—ragged, mole-like, cadaverous. He worked long and arduously, and often into the deep watches of the night, for the merchandise wherein he had dealings was in constant and hurried demand. His work-place was a cellar, damp and dreary, and ill-lit by a dingy oil-lamp. He had a wife and children, and he buried the dead to support the living. Day after day, and month after month, and year after year he toiled, this old man, making coffins of elm, wherein were hidden the dead, that men might behold them no more. His customers were the poor and broken in spirit, and his cellar was wet with the tears of the afflicted. With a rare foresight he made his own coffin, that his widow might be spared the expense of purchasing it. To him came the tree, fresh from the fragrance and living sweetness of the sunlit fields. He cut it up into short pieces, and of them fashioned his wares. It made many of them, and many was not enough. And so, bit by bit, it was taken away and returned to the earth whence it came; and the last coffin that was carried out of that dreadful cellar took with it him who had fashioned it.

Yet, since it alone assuaged the suffering of their pain, lifted the burden from the heavy-laden, and brought the weary into their appointed rest; since its place was the place of mourning and lamentation, its speech the low cry of the afflicted, and its silence the unbroken stillness of the grave; since for ever with it marched surely Death, its destiny was austere indeed.

Wister on Spelling Reform

If the most infallible method of putting a scheme to death consists in making it ridiculous, then, Owen Wister's skit, "How Doth the Simple Spelling Bee" should dispose of the efforts of the spelling reformers during the lifetime of the present generation. But the movement was so absurd in itself that our author had no easy task to "go them one better at their own game." Mr. Wister presents to us a busy author in the midst of his own work, who is harassed into accepting a position on the Simplified Spelling Board brought together by Professor Masticator B. Fellows of Chiclé University, on the principle that women have been known to accept a persistent suitor, "to get rid of him." The delegates who are to re-create the orthography of the English language hail from all points of the compass, and as might be surmised, they soon begin to go to pieces on the rock of phonetics, for what is phonetic to one is not so to the others. They cannot recognize each others' "improvements," and by the end of the first session of the board, no two are on speaking terms with each other with the exception of Professor Jesse Williams and Miss Appleby, who, it is early surmised, are more interested in each other than in the vagaries of the language. Mr. Wister gently hints that the whole movement was an advertising scheme; and whether it succeeded or failed it called attention to certain people. "The Simple Spelling Bee" illustrates not that side of Mr. Wister which gave us "The Virginian," and "Lady Baltimore," but rather, that other little absurdity, "Philosophy Four." Illustrations, which really illustrate, are by F. R. Gruger, and the brief hundred pages of pure fun are given to us through the Macmillan Company.

When I Was a Girl in Italy

Marietta Ambrosi's addition to the Children of Many Lands Series, one of the enterprises of the Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, will meet the approval of those for whom it is designed, the little girls of other lands than Italy. The story is written from the standpoint of the child, and gives all the details which the little folks crave. This little girl's mother was born in America, her family returning to Italy when she was about fourteen, and Marietta herself was distinguished as "The Daughter of the American," to account for all her vagaries. She tells of the customs, industries, costumes, pleasures and religious festivals of the common people, the middle classes who most truly are representative. She was a busy and active little maiden who managed to see about all there was to see and to take part in most of it. How she helped to make lint for the soldiers in the Croatian war, what she saw of Garibaldi, and the many and various "shows" which she organized and directed will appeal both to boys and girls. Her experiences with the silk worms will prove of especial concern to Californians, old and young, since it is one of the industries put forward periodically as easy, pleasant and remunerative. Only to read of it as experienced by this little girl, makes us echo her own conclusion, "I was glad the butterfly season was over, any way." "When I was a Girl in Italy" is one of the best written of the series. Marietta Ambrosi has not forgotten what it was like to be a little girl. She confesses without shame that she kept her doll until she was eighteen, an infallible indication that she was not in any haste to be grown up. The same matter in other form has been published before, but the publishers have recognized the value of the material and the author has revised and rewritten to suit the present demand. The price is 75c.

some and sumptuous. I was very tired, and going to my little dark room, surveyed, not without misgiving, the bed on which I was to spend five nights. I was just beginning to undress when I heard a great knocking at the street door. In a moment my room was burst violently into, and before I had realized what on earth was happening, I found myself seized by two soldiers, while the sergeant, so friendly and polite in the day, looked upon me with triumph. I was really so taken aback that for a moment I had nothing to say; then with some irritation I asked him what in Heaven's name he was up to.

"Monsieur le Consul has ordered me to arrest you. You will be lodged in the gaol tonight, and tomorrow morning he will examine you himself."

"But it's absurd," I answered, and I could not help laughing at my ridiculous situation.

"It's no laughing matter, Monsieur," he said sternly.

"You need not be disagreeable about it," I remarked. "Tell these men to let go of me and I will accompany you wherever you like. I am quite willing to spend the night in your prison if it amuses you, and I feel sure the bed with which you intend to provide me will be no more objectionable than this."

The sergeant hesitated for an instant, and then seemed to make up his mind that I did not look a very dangerous ruffian.

"Very well," he said. "Take your hands off Monsieur. Follow me."

There was no one about to see the edifying spectacle which I presented as I marched through the streets, thus escorted, to the local gaol. They put me in quite an agreeable little cell, locked the door ponderously, and so left me to my own reflections. I admit that the night seemed endless. It was very dark, and I felt that horrible things were crawling over me. There was a fetid, oppressive smell. I sought in vain for the diverting side of the incident, but I was too uncomfortable, and I freely cursed my craving for the romantic, which had driven me to this inhospitable place. I cared no longer for the lovely damsels whom my fancy had presented plaiting their long black tresses or darkening their eyes with kohl; and if there were any in the neighborhood I only wished they would free me from the cruel beasts that were biting, biting. But in the morning a soldier brought me some excellent coffee, and I induced him to get me also the wherewithal to wash and a barber to shave me. These things performed, feeling fresher and more contented, I looked forward to my interview with the Consul with curiosity and interest. I was told this official would see me at half-past ten, and then I should discover for what monstrous crime I was thus evilly entreated.

In due course the sergeant came with two soldiers and told me I must now go to the Consulate. Between them, doing my best to look accustomed to the process, I stalked through the winding alleys till we came to a long, low, handsome building with a verandah, neat iron railings, and a charming garden. At the gate stood a sentry, and above waved the tricolor; upon my word, except for the Arab gardener busily at work, I might have been suddenly transported to France. I was taken into a large, cool room, barely furnished, but with masses of flowers everywhere. They suggested a woman's taste and forethought. At a desk, littered with papers, sat a little man with grey hair, cut very short, and a large grey moustache, excessively fierce and bristling; he was dressed in white, dapperly, and his figure was trim and neat. I found afterwards that his eyes were very alert, and he gesticulated in conversation with much vivacity. He was writing as I entered, and did not look up when the sergeant duly announced me. He passed his hands impatiently through the many papers, looking for the sergeant's official account of my arrival and arrest.

"Approchez," he said, then glanced at me quickly. But the glance lengthened into a stare, his face fell; and then, recovering himself, his eyes began to twinkle.

"But Monsieur isn't a spy, sergeant," he cried.

"Is that it?" I said, and began to chuckle.

I don't know why my amusement should have had such an effect on the Consul, but immediately he burst into a roar of laughter; he threw himself back in his chair and held his sides. But though he evidently found it a huge joke, the sergeant's face grew longer and longer. "Monsieur's conduct has been most suspicious," he said. "He walked round the town yesterday and was seen to make notes of all he saw."

The sergeant produced my note-book and gravely handed it to the Consul.

"Will you allow me to look at it?" asked he politely.

"By all means," I answered, somewhat surprised that he understood English.

And while he turned over the pages the sergeant repeated every one of my movements on the preceding day. It was unheard of that an Englishman should arrive in a Spanish ship and come on the island to stay. What could be my motives except to discover whether it was fortified and if men-o'-war could enter the harbor with safety. Without the shadow of a doubt I was a spy of the most dangerous class, and Monsieur le Consul would regret that he had not listened to the sergeant when the British fleet bombarded the town.

"But, sergeant," answered the Consul, "it will not assist the English Admiral in the least to learn from this gentleman's notes that the women here have magnificent eyes and that the Jews are as picturesque as they are dirty."

"Monsieur has, no doubt, written his observations in cypher," said the sergeant.

The Consul turned to me.

"Would you be so obliging as to tell me your name?"

I said it, and he repeated it thoughtfully.

"I wonder where I've heard that? Ah!" He gave a cry and seized a number of the Journal des Debats which lay on the table. "Is this you?" He passed over the paper, and, to my great joy, I saw an article on a little book of mine.

I acknowledged that I was the blushing author of that work, and, with a bound, the Consul sprang up, dashed round the table, and seizing both my hands, wrung them violently.

"But I'm delighted to make your acquaintance. My wife is devoted to English novels—she's Swiss, you know, she comes from Geneva—the best place in the world to find a wife, a hive of young ladies, my dear fellow—and she loves your English novels because they're so pure. She will be charmed to see you and you shall talk English to her. My wife is a linguist, Monsieur, a wonderful linguist. And there is the luncheon bell. Excellent! Come to luncheon."

I was perfectly overwhelmed by this stream of verbosity hurled at me in one breath, and before I could answer the Consul had turned to the sergeant who stood helplessly by.

"You are an idiot. You, with your mania for finding spies all over the place. Monsieur is not a spy any more than you are. He is a man of letters, and my wife has read a book that he has written. You are an imbecile, sergeant. Come, Monsieur, or the eggs will be cold."

He seized my arm and dragged me away, leaving the sergeant and his myrmidons astounded and perplexed. The Consul led me to a charming dining-room where stood a tall, rather stout lady of forty-five. Her hair, of a pleasant brown, was very simply arranged; her features were placid and handsome; her soft grey eyes suggested infinite good nature. She was by no means beautiful, but gave one the impression that advancing years had only added to her attractiveness, and there was about her a staid gracefulness which was very comforting and restful.

"Allow me to present you to my wife, Madame de Pornichet," said the Consul with a flourish.

In one breath, voluble as ever, he related the whole story of my misadventure, told her who I was, and added that he had asked me to stay at the Consulate for the rest of my visit to the island. This was the first I had heard of such an invitation, but when it was seconded by the amiable, stately lady, I made no difficulty in gratefully accepting. It was as delightful as it was unexpected to eat in that distant spot an admirable French luncheon; and everything was so fresh, so clean, so dainty, that I felt amply rewarded for my trivial sufferings. My hostess was not talkative, nor was this strange, since her husband monopolized the conversation; but now and then she put in a little kindly word, whereupon he stopped suddenly and looked at her as though some precious feast of wit had fallen from her lips. And while he rolled out anecdote after anecdote, fact upon fact (all of which I discovered later was highly unreliable), with regard to the island he governed, her eyes rested upon him with a tender smile of almost maternal affection.

Coffee and liqueurs were brought in, and we lit our cigars.

"I'm sure it's very good of you to be so hospitable," I said. "I was looking forward to abominable discomfort on this island."

"Good!" cried the Consul. "You don't know how pleased I am to have a civilized man to entertain my wife. I always fear that she will be bored to death, for there is no one here to amuse her but myself."

"And I'm sure you do it very well," I answered.

Madame de Pornichet gave me a radiant smile of gratitude.

"Ah, you are right," she said. "No one could be bored in Lucien's company."

"Come, come, my dear," said the Consul, deprecatingly but delighted.

She stretched out her hand, and most gallantly he kissed it.

"Mon petit chou," she said, and tears of happy love actually glistened in her eyes. She turned to me. "You see, love sometimes comes before marriage, and sometimes after. But when it comes after it lasts till death."

"Sophie, ma chere enfant," said the Consul, and it was rather amusing that he should so address her, for she was a great deal bigger and more imposing than he. "I must tell Monsieur how I had the good fortune to make your acquaintance."

"It is insupportable," she answered, to me, smiling. "He tells this story to everyone he meets."

It was evident, however, that Madame de Pornichet was not unwilling I also should hear it, and the Consul settled himself more comfortably in his chair.

"Well, you must know that the best years of my life were spent with our Colonial Army in Algeria, in Senegal, in Tonquin; and I was successively Lieutenant, Captain, and Major. But, my dear friend, I succumbed at last to a pestiferous climate, and at the age of forty-five my health forced me to leave the service. That was twelve years ago, and I am still an active man, not unfit for work nor unused to it. I applied for a colonial appointment, I had some influence, and in due course the Minister sent for me to offer the governorship of this island. The post was one that exactly suited me, the salary was adequate, and it was not so far from civilization that I should feel myself cut off from all my friends. I accepted there and then, and told the Minister I was ready to start whenever he chose.

"'Very well,' he said 'You will take up your duties in six weeks from now. That will allow your wife time to make all needful preparations.'

"'But I have no wife,' I said. 'I am a bachelor.'

"'What?' cried the Minister. 'But that is very unfortunate, for I make a point of never sending an unmarried man to such a place. For a hundred reasons it is essential that you should be married.'

"'I regret enormously,' I answered.

"'I am afraid I cannot break an important and salutary rule. You must marry at once.'

"'I?'

"'You can imagine my consternation, for nothing of the sort had ever entered my head,' and I ventured mildly to expostulate. But the Minister would not listen to a word.

"'Voyons,' he said, 'you have six weeks. In that time you can easily find a wife.'

"He dismissed me and I walked away sorely troubled. On the one hand I was delighted with my good fortune in getting precisely the post of all others which I should have chosen: on the other I was dismayed at the thought of marriage. An old bachelor of my age would have great difficulty in changing his habits to those of a matrimonial life. Fortunately, I met an old friend of mine, a professor at the Sorbonne, a native of Geneva, and I told him at once of my great perplexity.

"'But don't hesitate, my friend,' he said. 'Of course you must marry. Du reste, at your age it is fit that a man should settle down and live a respectable life.'

"'But, mon Dieu, where am I to find a wife in six weeks? You cannot expect me to advertise in the Figaro.'

"'Why not? It is as good a way as another.'

"The result of this conversation was that within twenty-four hours an advertisement appeared in that widely circulated paper, stating my age and position, income, and giving as flattering an account as I honestly could, of my personal attractions. Then began my troubles. I went to the office of the Figaro next day to call for any replies that might have come, and the clerk brought me a sack—a large sack, Sir.

"'Here are the answers to your advertisement, Monsieur,' he said, with a malicious grin.

"I staggered, and gave a cry of horror. However, in a moment I regained my self-possession, seized the sack, and, laden like a coal-heaver, hailed a cab. I drove to my hotel, and once in my room emptied it out on the floor. Monsieur, seven hundred and forty-eight ladies desired to marry me. I spent two days reading the letters, in which they described their charms, and examining the photographs, which, according to my request, they had sent me. They were of all years, from sixteen to those who described themselves as of a certain age; they were fat, they were thin, they were dark or blonde, they were of every station, from sempstresses to the widows of noblemen. They were single, or divorced, or widows; and some were betwixt and between. But all offered a loving heart and a sincere devotion. At the end my brain reeled. My Swiss friend came to see me, and when he saw the piles of letters, the piles of photographs, he laughed as though he would never stop.

"'But it is a serious matter,' I said. 'Time is flying and I have but five weeks and four days to marry a wife. You cannot expect me to interview seven hundred and forty-seven palpitating hearts.'

"'What will you do then?'

"'I will send back all their photographs, and write to the Minister that what he asks is impossible. I must lose my island.'

"'Now listen,' answered the professor. 'You know I was born in Geneva, and I have relations living there. It has suddenly occurred to me that my cousin Sophie Vienque would exactly suit you. She is no longer quite young; nor are you, my friend; she is thirty, of pleasing appearance, and unmarried.'

"'But what makes you think she would marry me?'

"He shrugged his shoulders.

"'I do not see why she shouldn't. She has had time to grow bored with a single life, and I daresay will be pleased with the thought of an establishment of her own. You have much to offer. I can say without flattery that you are an agreeable man, robust still, and not lacking in intelligence. Anyhow, you can try.'

"'But, mon cher, how can I see her? On what pretext? I cannot call upon your cousin and take stock of her as though I were buying a horse.'

"The professor meditated for two minutes.

"'I have it. You will go to Geneva and offer her a box of chocolates from me. That will be an introduction. You can talk to her, and if she does not please you, all you have to do is to go your way. She will think you have merely come to make a trifling present on my behalf, and no harm will be done. On the other hand, if you like her it is easy for you to prosecute the acquaintance.'

"'I was delighted with the idea. We went out at once, bought the chocolates, and I took the next train to Geneva. I assure you a lover of eighteen could not have been more excited than I was. I arrived early in the morning, and, having attended to my appearance at the hotel, went about ten o'clock, the box of chocolates in my hand, to the address my friend had given. I was so fortunate as to learn that Mademoiselle Vienque was at home, and, being shown into the drawing-room, found myself in the presence of a very fine young woman. Tenez—I need not describe her, for there she sits before you; and, though twelve years have passed since then, she has altered only to become more ravishing each day.'

"'Voyons, Lucien,' expostulated Madame de Por-nichet. "'Monsieur will think you perfectly ridiculous.'

"'Well, I executed my commission, received her thanks, and told her the professor was in the best of health. We began to chat, and the conversation went so easily that I was astounded when the clock struck eleven. I said to myself at once that if this charming lady was able to talk for an hour to a perfect stranger so that it seemed to him no more than five minutes, on closer acquaintance she could not fail to be entertaining during a lifetime. Everything about her pleased me. She was evidently fitted for the duties of a Consul's wife: her attractive person, her amiable conversation—"

"How often have I told you, Lucien," interrupted his wife, "that you talked so incessantly on that occasion that I was not able to make one observation?"

He smiled and patted her hand.

"I rose to my feet," he continued, "and addressed her as follows: 'Mademoiselle, it will have occurred to you that I did not take the long journey from Paris to Geneva merely to present you with a box of chocolates.'"

"Evidently," said she.

"I came, in point of fact, to make you an offer of marriage."

"Before she recovered from her astonishment I explained the circumstances, told her my position, and so far as possible sketched my character and my idiosyncrasies. Finally, I proposed that we should be married in a week from that day."

"But, Monsieur, I don't know you," she said.

"You will have abundant opportunities of making my acquaintance when we are settled on our island. There will be nothing else to do."

"I saw that she did not dislike the idea, and I ventured a little to insist."

"Well, I will consult my father," she said at last.

"But, Mademoiselle, though Monsieur your father is without doubt an excellent man, it is not he whom I wish to marry, but you. Do I displease you?"

"No," she admitted, "not precisely."

"Then why should you refuse me?"

"Give me till tomorrow to think it over."

"I regret infinitely, dear lady, but as I tell you, my time is excessively limited. I beseech you to give me an answer now."

"This minute?"

"This very minute."

"She smiled and reached out her hand. 'Very well, Monsieur, since you insist—I accept.'"

The Consul drank a glass of wine.

"Monsieur, fourteen days after my visit to the Minister, I was a married man, and I discovered that I had never known happiness before. My wife is a treasure, a jewel, and I think she loves me."

"Mon petit chou," said Madame de Pornichet tenderly.

"And if you are a bachelor, Monsieur, go to Geneva. I assure you it is a bee-hive, a veritable bee-hive of young ladies."

The Consul thus ended his story; and I, who had come to this curious island searching for romance, felt that I had found it, and, of all places, in a marriage of convenience.

Curious things are sometimes responsible for changes made in the design of a motor car. An instance of this came when one of the staff that designed the Thomas Flyer was walking along a Buffalo street last summer and saw one of his cars running on Delaware avenue carrying fourteen people. Four of them were standing on the running boards, two on each side. It immediately occurred to him that there was a possibility of someone being hurt should the car strike a bump and one of the running board supports break. As a result drawings were made the next day by which the running boards of the 1907 cars are all equipped with three instead of two drop-forged braces.

Good cheer and every luxury may be enjoyed at THE SEVERN, 1050 Geary street.

The Thaw Verdict

Disappointment mingled with a great deal of satisfaction occupies the mind after due consideration of the result of the Thaw case; disappointment that a verdict could not have been obtained after so protracted and so expensive a trial and satisfaction that a majority of the jury favored a verdict of murder in the first degree. When the crime was committed much was written in the press of this country and Great Britain about the probable fate of the millionaire slayer. It was pointed out, and very correctly too, that not Harry Thaw merely but our whole criminal system would be on trial when the slayer of Stanford White was arraigned. Cynicism asserted that no jury in America would hang a millionaire, no matter how inexcusable and cold-blooded his offense; the wisdom of experience had it that the combination of circumstances surrounding this particular case—the position of Thaw, the character of White, the beauty of Evelyn Nesbit and the nature of the story which supplied the motive for the deed—precluded the possibility of such a verdict as would be certain were the people involved obscure and commonplace. This latter opinion contains perhaps more than half the truth of the matter and so far, it is an indictment, not so much of our American institutions as of our human nature which never inclines steadfastly to pure justice, but sees in every case something which seems to demand for it a little different treatment from all the rest. Considering the sort of defense made in the Thaw case, it is really remarkable that the balance in the juryroom tipped to the side of conviction. From first to last the appeal of the attorneys who defended Harry Thaw was to the strongest passions and prejudices that possess the ordinary American. Whether true or false the story so skillfully unfolded on the stand by the beautiful child-wife was calculated to unseat impartiality and substitute a strong leaning toward the defendant in the minds of every one of the jurors. The insistence on the “unwritten law” and “dementia Americana” might have been expected to work powerfully on the feelings of such men as are usually chosen for jury duty in criminal cases, for there is a strong plausibility about such pleas which appeals to the chivalric instinct and outwits reason when extreme caution is not exercised. Despite all this seven men voted to send Harry Thaw to the electric chair and the other five placed themselves on record as favoring his acquittal only because they were not convinced of his sane responsibility for his deed. No study of this result will justify the assertion that the jury was swayed by the wealth of the defendant and on this fact we may well congratulate ourselves. Melancholy as may seem the satisfaction of knowing that a millionaire slayer has received exactly the same consideration as would have been accorded any other murderer who was in a position to make a similar defense, it is justified in view of the increasing tendency to idolize money and set those most successful in accumulating it above the common statutes which is observable everywhere in this country. Harry Thaw's millions undoubtedly enabled him to make such a fight for liberty as would have been impossible for a poor man, but no matter how much his expensive attorneys juggled with the evidence, they were not able to cloud the issue so effectually as to secure his acquittal. It would be an unwarrantable comparison of small things with great to argue the attitude of the majority of American men toward such a crime from the attitude of the majority in the Thaw jury, but we may be allowed to insist that the preponderance of sympathy throughout the land continues on the side of the fifth commandment.

A Welcome Release

To the man who considers himself obligated to keep abreast of current events, the conclusion of the Thaw trial comes as a gratifying surcease from misery. Now that it is all over for awhile the newspapers will have from one to three pages daily at their disposal for the publication of news of real importance, using the phrase in a sense which precludes its application to the lengthy accounts of the Thaw case. That the public taste demanded all that the papers supplied of the trial of Harry Thaw goes without saying; editors are too wise to incur the expenses which the Thaw trial has entailed upon them unless it is both necessary and profitable for them to do so. All the newspapers of this city had increased circulations during the progress of the case and the increase was in proportion to the fullness with which they reported it. It is extremely difficult to nauseate the gross common taste, but it is debateable whether the public was not nearly sated when the trial came to an end. Day after day it had served up to it column on column of sickly sentimental gush, the most salient characteristic of which was its deadly monotony. The special writers in New York seem never to have tired of describing the girlish costume which Evelyn Thaw almost invariably wore in the courtroom (very probably on the advice of the astute Delmas); they had an apparently inexhaustible supply of adjectives at command for the description of Harry Thaw's appearance. They were ever ready to suffer a literary brainstorm when anything in the proceedings aroused the emotions of the defendant's aged mother. They were no mollycoddles, these young men who sat day after day and listened to the wranglings of Delmas and Jerome and the unintelligible patter of the experts, for they wrought thousands after thousands of words out of each day's incidents and seemed as fresh and enthusiastic on the last day of the trial as on the first. But though they were indefatigable it must be admitted that their readers tired of it all. There was no variety to spice it. The most approved journalistic methods demanded that the side of the murderer and his wife should be espoused and that no word of defense should be uttered for poor Stanford White, a man whose glorious artistic achievements made him worth a thousand Harry and Evelyn Thaws but whose libertinism lends itself to the disingenuous uses of popular newspaper policy. It was an extremely fortunate thing that Justice Fitzgerald had the foresight to lock up the jury during the whole trial and to keep from their eyes all that the papers published about it. If they had been permitted to see the case through the eyes of the New York editors the outcome might have been different. One hears much nowadays of trying cases in the newspapers and our legislative solons have been at work to put a stop to what is considered a menacing evil, but the twelve men who held Thaw's fate in their hands were uninfluenced by editorial utterances. They are probably the only men in the country who have any curiosity to see Harry Thaw's name in print. The rest of us are weary of the subject and long for some absorbing news of a healthier sort.

Our Unspeakable Grafters

It would be hard to find anywhere in the annals of municipal government a more anomalous situation than that which the self-confessed boodlers who constitute the legislative branch of the administration are occupying. With an affectation of graceful ease which cannot conceal their self-conscious awkwardness they take their accustomed seats in the supervisory chamber and proceed with the business of the city as though incorruptible integrity and stern civic virtue were the qualities they treasured above all others. Calm deliberation seems throned upon their brows; enthusiastic zeal for reasoned economy appears to be with them the consuming passion. Theirs is the bearing of statesmen whom no unworthy considerations can sway from the path of rectitude, who insist on being the captains of their unstained souls no matter how strait the gate, how charged with punishment the scroll. They have stricken sinecures from the municipal payroll; they have lopped dead and useless timber from the spreading administration tree; they have advocated the passage of good laws, thundering out the platitudes of civics with all the zest of amateurs. They are doing these and many other things which in the abstract would be admirable and praiseworthy, yet is no man misled or dazzled by their performances. As false now as when their sins had not publicly found them out and the ignorant still had confidence in their probity and unselfishness, they are maintaining a sickening semblance of honesty and integrity which deceives nobody and only intensifies in the general mind that pessimistic distrust of all the appearances of good which follows the knowledge of widespread depravity. Used to hypocrisy and dissimulation they are now at no loss to counterfeit the presentment of innocence and their souls are at once so petty and so hopelessly damned beyond the possibility of good that they know no shame, can summon no blush to palliate the starkness of their nakedness. Operated like grinning marionettes by the unseen hand of their nemesis, they would pretend if they could that their actions are their own, that whatever credit is due for their recent reformation belongs to themselves. Hence have they risen in their places to repudiate Mayor Schmitz and Abe Ruef as the twin-tempters who wove malign spells about their souls, holding them in thrall until counter-magic had released them. And if they could they would have us think that this is their declaration of independence, that henceforth they are to call their souls their very own and serve their city with singleness and loftiness of purpose. But a grotesque fate has decreed that these men shall never be free. It was written somewhere that they should pass from the ownership of a boss who trafficked criminally in their weakness and venality to the ownership of a public prosecutor who is bending their crooked wills to the performance of his plans for the weal of the city. When they have served his turn they will be flung to the dunghill where they belong and a loathsome infamy will fight with oblivion for their memories.

Scientific Teaching

The teachers of San Diego County, in institute assembled, have declared by vote that grammar is a useless study which they would like to discard in favor of "practical lessons in English," another way of saying that they have made a failure of teaching grammar, and would like to see the relics of their botchery buried out of sight. Grammar, in the old fashioned sense, was long ago discarded for what was called language lessons, and language lessons having proved a failure some other substitute for shiftlessness must be sought out. It would be interesting to know what the modern scientific educator does not consider a "useless branch." Elliot Flower's remark concerning scientific motherhood, that the scientific wouldn't do any harm if there were some mothering to go along with it, is applicable to scientific teaching as well. It may be beautifully scientific, but the unalterable fact which faces us at the end of the experiments is that nothing has been learned. Time has gone by, material has been wasted, pupils have grown from infancy to maturity, the "system" has been perfected, but the practical result is a series of cyphers. All over the country, from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific Coast, from the Mexican line to the Canadian border, parents are giving voice to their opinions concerning "scientific" teaching, all to no purpose, and the result is that those who take a serious interest in the advancement of their children are sending them to private schools, where the sequence of the alphabet, the multiplication table, and the substantial spelling lesson are not neglected; where "literature" is not polluted and diluted by unliterary teachers who never open a book of any kind voluntarily. In the March "Sunset," Mrs. May Cheney has voiced what she calls a protest against the cry of "The common schools for the common people." Apparently she imagines that when "the common people" complain that the three R's are neglected they are objecting to the maintenance of the State University out of the common funds. The people do not object to a State endowed university but they do decidedly and emphatically object to a school system which fits pupils for a university and for nothing else on earth. The mechanic and the day laborer know full well that their boys and girls, whatever position in life they may fill, will need to be able to read plain print intelligently, to add a column of figures accurately and to express themselves clearly. They know equally well that not one in ten thousand will ever have occasion to paint a picture or lead an orchestra. Professor Hugo Munsterberg puts his finger on the sore spot when he says the trouble with our American teaching from the first day to the last is lack of thoroughness, that approximate results are accepted instead of accuracy, and that the American child knows not the meaning of the word must. In connection with the defunct spelling reform, and the supposed advantages enjoyed by the German pupil, who, it is assumed, has no spelling problem though in point of fact such is not the case, the eminent psychologist says that the multiplication table must be much simpler in German also, and the maps in the German geographies modified in subtle fashion, in order to enable the children to stand two or three years further advanced than those of the same age in our country. The simple, plain fact is that we sadly need old-fashioned teachers, and a return to the old order which assumed that in order to learn studying must be resorted to. Our stream is too wide and is consequently shallow in proportion. We are erecting pyramids with the apex downward. There is no use in applying a coat of luminous paint to the atmosphere and trying to persuade ourselves that it is a solid wall. The San Diego teachers and their colleagues who think they can cover up their own deficiencies by discarding grammar should bear in mind the experience of the young housewife who carried out and buried her batch of dough that refused to rise, only to have the warm earth promote the process of fermentation so that she had not only to make her deferred explanation, but to provide another sepulture for her ghost that would not down.

The Inanity of Our Fiction

One of the explanations put forth for the inconsequence of most of the novels of the day is that the writers are so young. They have not acquired the necessary experience and knowledge of life, nor the distance from events which would furnish them with perspective. Example is cited in the case of the earlier writers, referred to as producers of classics, most of whom began to produce fiction after their fortieth year. No doubt there is some truth in this view, but it is to be remembered that there were young writers then as now. There has been time to forget even the names of the nonentities who were producing the popular reading when George Eliot made her first essay, and in forty years there will have been time to forget the names and the authors of this year's crop of best-sellers, too. The trouble with these seemingly "young" writers is that they make a habit of remaining young. They write one book which pays expenses and they are so elated with the success (?) that they never venture on anything better or different. There are scores of popular novelists whose books follow as closely on the same beaten track as though they were cows coming in from the pasture. They step aside in precisely the same place, crop the same buttercups, and bring up against the same bars; and the readers who regale themselves on such fare would not have it otherwise. It is not that the writers themselves are so young but that the readers are chiefly of the class in which there is no mental development. These readers are content to remain in one groove forever. They are of that Philistine middle class that Matthew Arnold loved to write about. They abound in the insurance and banking circles of this city. One meets many of them on the trip to Sausalito and along the roads in the neighborhood of Ross Valley. They are the fashionable illiterates of San Francisco society. Magazines that were once reputed to be high-class and that are known to be highly respectable but that are now moribund and dull they expose to view as though they were hallmarks of culture. These people are the omnivorous readers of current fiction. In manufacturing novels, as in making gloves or shoes, the needs of the purchasers are to be considered. There are not enough people with six fingers or double heels to make it worth while to provide for them, though it might pay someone to establish a factory to cater to their needs. Literary mechanics, likewise, do not care for fancy custom. The average reader wants to know whether She gets Him in the end, or whether, securing Him in the first place, She can hold to her possession for four hundred pages. Someone once said that all the novels in the world are comprised in the formulas, one man and two women, or two men and one woman. Your hack writer makes his selection of one or the other, decides whether the marriage shall come in the first chapter or the last, and sets himself to pad out his pages accordingly. A century ago the lovers were given to horseback canter or drives in coaches. Today they go about in an automobile. A decade or so ago they were devoted to bicycling. Once the fair one's charms were displayed by the radiance of a wax candle, but now she beams under an electric light, and the fashion of her frocks varies in the same way. Today she talks the latest slang, and where once the dear creatures swooned at every opportunity now they display muscular arms and charm by the grace of their athletic gait. Writers that turn out this stuff may be fifteen or fifty. They require nothing but the muscular strength to wield a pen or pound a typewriter. It is a species of unskilled labor at which youth may be as expert as age, and like other machine-made products, gives no evidence of any individuality on the part of the one who turns the crank. As people who are long confined in narrow spaces become short sighted, so these writers who never look beyond a fixed point never acquire a new standard by which to measure their achievements. Admitting, for the sake of argument that "one must live," it does not follow as a corollary that one must live by any specified employment. The remedy for the faults so obvious in the body of our fiction will not be brought about by the addition of years, but by the improvement of popular taste.

The Castle of Silence

By A. S. Adcock

It seemed its strength would ne'er decay;
Unshaken as the seasons rolled,
It stood today as yesterday,
And yet the years have made it old.

For still where age begins at last
No warning mile-stone marks the spot;
Without a sound our years go past,
And we grow old and know it not.

Grey ruin gaps the castle walls;
A silence, moss-like, o'er it stole
When life departed from its halls
As from the body goes the soul.

In festal nights whose moons are set
It throbbed with love and laughter sweet,
But now its mouldering floors forget
The music of the dancing feet.

Perspective Impressions

Conservative figuring shows that Abe Ruef has become liable so far to imprisonment for not less than three hundred years. The prosecution might stretch a point and lop off one hundred of these on condition that he confesses and implicates Calhoun.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller's most recent contribution to the cause of education being slightly in excess of the amount which a jury has found that he owes to the State the question now arises whether he over-estimated his indebtedness to the conscience fund or the jury erred in its calculations.

While the world of petty thieves and two-penny-halfpenny fires points the finger of scorn at us, incapable, as it is, of understanding the largeness of the Pacific Coast, let not the wounded soul of our local patriotism forget to apply plentifully to itself the pleasant unction exuding from the thought that the criminaloid of California is to the criminaloid of elsewhere as the sequoia gigantea to the pot pine of Japan.

That personification of the strong arm of the law, Hercules Heney, is certainly taking its time in bringing to a close its labor of cleansing our political mews. Meanwhile heaven is holding its nose.

The lawyers for the defense in the infamous Thaw case are to be congratulated. They have at last succeeded in doing what from time immemorial the learned sophists of the law have mightily desired but vainly tried to do. They have proved to the satisfaction of the world, in behalf of their client, that White was black.

Having had such success with the Ananias Association which is now safely launched on the seas of clubdom, our versatile president ought to turn his attention to the formation of a woman's club, designed for the sole use of those ladies who have been excluded from the White House. Mrs. Morris and Mrs. Von Claussen would be charter members and Mrs. William Jennings Bryan might make a very plausible plea for membership.

Triolet Making

By R. L. Taylor

"The-Triolet," says a writer in a contemporary, "is one of the simplest and easiest forms of verse and one that may be used only for the treatment of frivolous or humorous themes." Something about on a par with the limerick, is probably what this writer conceives the triolet to be. Or perhaps he would pronounce it of no higher quality than the Mother Goose rhymes, those exceptionally fine specimens of the perfection of the musical form of poetry. That the triolet is simple I am prepared to believe; and that it is easy, too. No less an authority than William Ernest Henley affirms the "easiness" of it. He says:

"Easy is the triolet,
If you really learn to make it!
Once a neat refrain you get,
Easy is the triolet.
As you see—I pay my debt
With another rhyme, Deuce take it
Easy is the triolet
If you really learn to make it!"

So, it is only a question of learning to make it. And that being the case all that one need do is consult Webster, who says that a triolet is a stanza of eight lines, of which the first line must be repeated three times. Getting a neat refrain is of course no trick at all. That is within the power of any of the poets that abound in Sausalito and Berkeley. The woods are full of them. This I judge from the streams of verse that pour into magazine offices, and from the quality of which I infer that, as it has been said that poets are born, not made, the impression prevails that the power of versification is heaven-sent and depends not on cultivation. One thing is quite certain: comparatively few of our minstrels are aware of the fact that verse is governed by certain inflexible laws which are not to be glimpsed intuitively or learned merely by reading poetry. So it is quite likely that the great majority of our minstrels, after consulting the dictionary, will proceed to dash off triolets, which are so simple and so easy. Poets who are indifferent to the importance of syllables and pauses in verse, of all the essentials to melody and who roam unbridled through the fields of poesy will naturally find in the simple and easy triolet an easy medium for the expression of their frivolous and humorous moods. It would be too bad, however, were they to be barred from using the triolet for any but light and frivolous themes. I wish to inform them that they have excellent authority for extending the range of emotion in the triolet. Ernest Radford, inspired by the release of a murderer from prison wrote these tragical lines:

I killed her? Ah, why do they cheer?
Are those twenty years gone today?
Why, she was my wife, sir, dear—so dear.
I killed her? Ah, why do they cheer?
. . . Ah hound! He was shaking with fear,
And I rushed—with a knife, they say . . .
I killed her? Ah, why do they cheer?
Are those twenty years gone today?

And surely H. C. Bunner was in no frivolous or humorous mood when he wrote these wistfully, tenderly pathetic lines, which seem to me to comply with Webster's definition of a triolet:

A pitcher of mignonette
In a tenement's highest casement;
Queer sort of a flower pot; yet
That pitcher of mignonette
Is a garden in heaven set
To the little sick child in the basement
The pitcher of mignonette
In the tenement's highest casement.

After reflecting on the foregoing verses I am inclined to think that my contemporary would unwarrantably restrict the maker of triolets. For it doth seem to me that the form may be adopted to subjects that are neither frivolous nor humorous. His view of the province of the triolet is as narrow as that which once conceived rhyme to be as unfit for anguish and deep distress as for subjects elevated and lofty, and suitable only for sportive love, mirth, gaiety, humor and ridicule. Mr. Griffith Alexander has employed the triolet for the highest form of poetic imagery, vitalizing a tender sentiment in these simple lines:

She's neither scholarly nor wise,
But, oh, her heart is wondrous tender.
And love lies laughing in her eyes.
She's neither scholarly nor wise,
And yet above all else I prize
The right from evil to defend her,
She's neither scholarly nor wise;
But, oh, her heart is wondrous tender.

While it must be conceded that the triolet is a feat of literary gymnastics it has nevertheless served as the vehicle for much serious poetry, and it has found favor with some of the greatest scholars. It is a form that came into existence in France in the thirteenth century. A very fine specimen is to be found in the works of Froissart the historian. Probably the most facile writer of triolets in recent years is Mr. Austin Dobson who does not always deal in the very lightest themes. Here is a recent one from his pen:

O, Love's but a dance,
Where Time plays the fiddle!
See the couples advance,—
O, Love's but a dance!
I whisper, a glance,—
"Shall we twirl down the middle?"
O, Love's but a dance,
Where Time plays the fiddle!

Probably the most lilting of the Dobson triolets is the following:

Rose kissed me today.
Will she kiss me tomorrow?
Let it be as it may,
Rose kissed me today,
But the pleasure gives way
To a savour of sorrow:—
Rose kissed me today—
Will she kiss me tomorrow?

Among the very eminent men of letters who have not disdained the triolet form is Mr. Edmund Gosse. The following from his pen is far from "frivolous or humorous":

Happy, my Life! The love you proffer,
 Eternal as the gods above:
 With such a wealth within my coffer,
 Happy my life. The love you proffer,—
 Will prove the Koh-i-noor of love;
 Happy, my Life! The love you proffer,
 Eternal as the gods above.

One of the best of the lighter triolets is the following from an unknown author entitled Apology for gazing at a young lady in church:

The sermon was long
 And the preacher was prosy.
 Do you think it was wrong
 The sermon was long,

The temptation was strong,
 Her cheeks were so rosy.
 The sermon was long
 And the preacher was prosy.

One more before I close: Many years ago a young Irishman named Daly working as a reporter on the Sydney Bulletin dashed off a triolet for that paper and it has lived. Here it is:

"Glory calls me, I must go,"
 Said the lover to his lady.
 (Noble words are these I trow
 "Glory calls me I must go.")
 Back he came—another beau
 Toying with her tresses shady!
 "Glory calls me—I must go,"
 Said the lover to his lady.

"The Tale of the Turquoise Skull"

By F. Hume

PART I.

This story has been told by three different men. Each has embellished it according to his fancy, and constituted himself the hero. I object to these egotistical pilferers, for I alone am entitled to tell, in the first person, the tale of the turquoise skull. Should any one question my right to this principal role, I can point out that the forefinger of my left hand is missing. That loss substantiates my statement. I should like to know if those other three story-tellers lack the forefingers of their left hands. If not, they stand convicted of plagiarism.

When Harry Carstone and I went on a shooting excursion, we intended to strike for the Rockies. It was by no deliberate design that we found ourselves at Zacatecas. By a series of accidents which need not be set forth here, we drifted aimlessly southward. From New York we travelled to New Orleans, thence took ship to Vera Cruz, and, as a natural consequence, terminated our journey in Mexico City. And here we should have remained, had not Fate, by her favorite device of feminine influence, lured us—or rather one of us—to Zacatecas. If Harry had not followed Lola Tepeaca from capital to province, he might now be alive. As it was, he left Mexico City for Zacatecas, where he found Lola, the turquoise skull, and a grave. I came out of the affair with my life and the loss of a finger. To save Harry I would willingly have given the whole hand. But it was not to be; and although I punished Lola for her evil deeds, such reprisal was but poor compensation for the death of my college chum.

Ostensibly we sought Zacatecas in the mining interest, but I gave up my time to sight-seeing, and Harry spent most of his with Lola. Only once did I accompany him to her dwelling; then, seeing I was an inconvenient third, I went no more. As for Lola, she usually smoked cigarettes in a grass hammock swung on the azotea, while Harry sat at her feet and talked. I guessed what formed the gist of these conversations, from my friend's flushed face and sparkling eyes at their conclusion. And, judging that such trifling was unwholesome, I ventured a remonstrance, which he promptly resented. Experience should have taught me the futility of interfering.

"You can't marry the girl," said I impatiently; "she is half Indian, and wholly diabolical."

Harry drew his brows together, as was his habit when annoyed. I remembered that sign of temper at Eton when he went up for punishment. Still, he answered temperately enough:

"I know she is a half-caste, but she is not the—other thing."

"Isn't she, though! If ever I saw evil in a woman's eyes—"

"You need say no more, Frank," he interrupted, hotly; "it is shabby to speak ill of a woman behind her back."

"I will say it to her face if you like, Harry. Believe me, she is no good, and will certainly get you into trouble."

"I can take care of myself. I am no fool."

"You are a man, at all events," I retorted, "and all men are fools where a woman is concerned. Do you intend to present Lady Carstone with a half-caste daughter-in-law?"

"That is neither here nor there," said he sulkily, and turned on his heel to intimate that my interference was uncalled for. Later on he left the hotel to call on his Venus Pandemos. Having been thus rewarded for my mediation, I walked to the Casa de la Estrella to visit Fray Benito. He was a Dominican monk of archaeological tastes, with whom I had forgathered shortly after my arrival at Zacatecas. His monastery—named after the star of Bethlehem—was a peaceful old dwelling, with courts and corridors, a wonderful chapel, and an extensive library. When Fray Benito was not praying in the chapel, he was reading in the library; and here I found him wrestling with the crabbed Latin of a priestly author.

Our friendship was based on a common love for archaeology; but, as Harry's tastes did not lie in that direction, he sought neither monastery nor monk; and although I casually observed that I had a companion, I had not thought it necessary to inform the holy monk of the existence of Lola. It was only after my fruitless appeal to Harry that I mentioned the name of the half-caste siren to the Dominican. As a popular confessor in Zacatecas, he was likely to know something of the lady, and a little timely knowledge of

The Tale of a Judgeship

Though Judge Van Fleet was an easy winner in the recent contest which closed with his appointment to the bench of the new Federal Court it must not be inferred that the friends of Judge Sloss were not zealous in behalf of that distinguished jurist. Judge Sloss be it known was something more than a mere quiescent candidate in a receptive mood. He was in the hands of his friends and his friends made a noble effort to land him in the coveted job. Their activity was halcyon rather than vociferous, but it was marked by some masterful strokes that might have proved effective had they not been rendered negligible by the superior dexterity exerted in behalf of Judge Van Fleet. Judge Sloss had one friend whose manoeuvres excited a great deal of interest and not a few animadversions. Indeed among lawyers there is an affectation of high ethical disapproval at the perfervid zeal which he exhibited. But these lawyers should not be taken seriously. They base their criticisms upon the theory that there should not be too close an affinity between bench and bar. They forget that ideals may be clung to too fondly; that ideals sometimes rise to the level of an inconvenience. Their disparaging commentaries I cannot trust myself to reproduce in their original grace of rhetoric. Be it my duty alone to record the plain, unvarnished facts and to allude but briefly to the sentiments they inspired.

An Historical Dinner

Before plunging into these brief chronicles I shall by way of supplementary preface remark that I am prejudiced against that suspicious nature which considers it a violation of the proprieties for a lawyer to entertain a judge at dinner. In the profession which has been characterized as honorable as justice and as ancient as the forms of law there should be no objection to the promotion of good fellowship between jurists and attorneys. Therefore it is in a spirit free from ulterior design that I report that the lawyer who was making Judge Sloss's fight, a very prominent attorney, head of an old-time firm which does an extensive business in the Federal Courts, especially in Admiralty cases, entertained some representatives of the Federal judiciary at a dinner a few months ago. I allude to the dinner solely for the reason that on that occasion the candidacy of Judge Sloss was brought up for discussion. Perhaps it was the host that brought it up. Indeed I am quite sure that it was he. But that is merely a detail; likewise the host's ardent eulogium. Judge Sloss is an able and upright jurist and one may be easily inspired to eloquent panegyric when he is the subject of discussion. On this occasion the eloquence of the host was most persuasive and his guests enthusiastically acquiesced in his florid encomiums. These encomiums were interspersed with the nuts and endued with the aroma of the wine and when the feast was over the judges were not quite sure that they had not signed a decree quieting the title of Judge Sloss to the job that he craved.

A Boomerang

The fumes of that very pleasant dinner had long passed away when the charming host of the occasion moved on Washington equipped with letters of introduction from the very judges who had partaken of his exquisite hospitality. Arrived in Washington he opened the Sloss campaign. And, in the vernacular of the lobby it was a hummer. The distinguished attorney for San Francisco proved himself an ardent advocate. He hymned the praises of Judge Sloss in most melodious strains, and threw in a few jangling discords to indicate the disabilities of Judge Van Fleet. It is related that the anvil feature of the symphony created consternation for awhile among Judge Van Fleet's friends and that the wires between Washington and San Francisco were soon made hot with messages to and from the judges who had issued the letters of introduction. To messages of inquiry the judges responded with disclaimers and presently the news of the row reached the ears of President Roosevelt and he quickly put an end to the controversy by appointing Judge Van Fleet. Now it is said that the zeal of Judge Sloss's ambassador amounted to an indiscretion, and that he returned to town in a state of chagrin. The gossip in professional circles attributes indignation to the judges who were represented to have been hostile to Van Fleet and it is suggested that perhaps Van Fleet will find it somewhat difficult to school himself to an amiable attitude toward the attorney who tried so hard to beat him and who will have a great deal of business in his court. The moral of it all is said a well known attorney, Keep your hands off the bench.

Knows His Limitations

During a recent session of one of the inferior courts on Sacramento street the attention of the presiding and apparently overworked Justice of the Peace was called to the fact that his decision of a case, tried before, and submitted to him, was long overdue. He said to the anxious attorney:

"There isn't an authority cited either by you or the opposing counsel that's in point."

"Why don't you decide it according to justice, then?" asked the attorney, encouragingly.

"Why not according to common sense?" suggested another lawyer, unintentionally speaking above a whisper.

The Justice looked at the last speaker as though he should be pitied for his ignorance and not fined for contempt, and exclaimed:

"Do you suppose that if I had common sense I would be filling this position?" and he sighed audibly as his eyes fell upon his crowded calendar.

A Doctor's Disquisition

For a very entertaining disquisition on the subject of Viavi, a proprietary medicine, I am indebted to the editor of the local Medical Journal. I have not much faith in proprietary medicines, and the one under discussion does not appeal to my sex, yet I was pleased to be enlightened by high authority respecting this particular compound. I was pleased because while I had heard a great deal about it—much that was derogatory and much that was laudatory—on the whole my information induced confusion worse confounded. Therefore I cordially welcomed the expert opinion of the editor of the California State Journal of Medicine, for he is the mouthpiece of the sanhedrim of the cult that cures—or kills. Of course I was prepared to dilute his utterances, for I know that doctors abominate proprietary medicines, and that when they mount the bema to declaim against them it is somewhat difficult for them to divest themselves of their professional prejudices. And these prejudices are not always without justification. Bad proprietary medicines do fully as much harm in the world as do incompetent doctors and good doctors are intolerant of both. On the other hand good doctors have been known to entertain prejudices against good proprietary medicines; for even good doctors are swayed by general principles. The author of the disquisition under consideration is, I assume, a good doctor, but a prejudiced one nevertheless. And yet, though his prejudices are quite conspicuous, he has not succeeded in prejudicing me against the patented article which inspired his reprobation. On the contrary he has persuaded me that the compound is not without merit and that the chief objection to it is that it reduces the revenue of the medical profession.

The Burden of His Complaint

Singular to relate this expert disquisition was obviously intended as a diatribe against the men by whom it is marketed. It is clear that the author is very much pained at their success, and that he grieves sorely at the immense loss suffered by medical practitioners in consequence of the use of a compound which was not prescribed by duly certificated gynecologists and obstetricians. His admissions that the medicine contains no deleterious drug, and that it is sold for beneficent and not for evil purposes evidently cost him a great effort. He struggled manfully with his prejudices and with a mighty wrench detached from himself the truth relative to the object and ingredients, but he sent it forth to the accompaniment of an exultant sneer. The burden of his protestations is that the manufacturers of this medicine claim too much for it; that their laudation of it is extravagant and that their literature is deftly designed to inspire a confidence that should not exist. It would be impertinent for me, a layman, to question the soundness of these criticisms, but it were too much to expect me to stifle my sense of humor. Moreover it is impossible to control the impulse to drown with a snicker the echo of the medical expert's somewhat solemn sneer. Why should I who have been watching for years the constantly occurring revolutions in therapeutics be expected to hearken deferentially to a provincial but honest doctor affirming the iniquity of proclaiming the prepotency of a specific? Doctors, of all men, should be the least sceptical with respect to matters appertaining to the human organism. Yet they are the most dogmatic. Every international congress is the occasion for pronouncements of heterodox views by eminent bacteriologists, new fangled theories are being adopted every day and old fangled ones are being abandoned but there is never the slightest abatement of the cocksureness of the medical profession. All that the average practitioner really knows is that life is an exceedingly complicated task and that death is wonderfully concise and simple. He has been handling consumptives for many years but he doesn't know today whether infection comes from inoculation or inhalation or both. The drug that he prescribes today he repudiates tomorrow. The curative agency of one day is the poison of the next. And notwithstanding all the uncertainty that springs from this most inexact of the sciences we find doctors disparaging drugs they know nothing of and sneering at practices that have fully as much justification as their own.

Drug Versus Scalpel

Doctors are very zealous for the protection of the public from the empiricism that has not the endorsement of a medical college, but they are quite tolerant of the quackery within the ranks of the profession. Nay, they are quite tolerant of the worse than professional quackery—of the criminal practices of some of their very successful brethren. The diatribe which evoked these observations is directed against men, who, it is admitted by the author thereof, are disseminating much useful information and who are "eternally preaching" the importance of something of paramount importance to all women. Unquestionably they have done much good and are doing much good in the world. This is a conclusion to which the author of the diatribe unintentionally directs the dispassionate reader, but he feels that this beneficence is outweighed by the unscientific pretensions of the manufacturers of a drug which has unquestionably brought happiness to many thousands of homes. These unscientific pretensions he imprecates because they are calculated to persuade people to have less faith in medical skill. Now, in view of the number of quacks in the medical profession, I am not absolutely certain that there is not for the good of mankind too much faith in the skill of doctors. Perhaps with less faith, and fewer operations as a consequence there would be a measurable reduction of the death rate. At any rate I am not prepared to admit that a drug that can do no harm and that does much good is more to be dreaded than a scalpel in all sorts of scientific hands. Of one thing I am quite certain: if I were a doctor and had the stone-throwing habit I should not venture beyond the portals of my own glass house in search of targets.

Brady's Latest Offense

Just when we had begun to congratulate ourselves that the writers of fiction who cannot get an inspiration from anything short of a cataclysm had exhausted the possibilities of the disaster of last year after twelve months of unremitting wrist-work, lo and behold, along comes Cyrus Townsend Brady with the greatest thriller of them all. It has taken the industrious Cyrus a year to get around to the San Francisco earthquake, all his typewriters having been engaged during that time in catching up with the sequence of events. Cyrus has written a novel or a short story about everything else that has ever happened so it was inevitable that the occurrences of last April should engage his pen. The result of his newspaper readings about the catastrophe is embodied in a short story called "The Interne" published in Harper's Weekly, and of course he has chosen for his theme the weirdest and most wildly improbable of the incidents narrated by the paranoiacs who flourished right after the disaster. For the information of those who are fortunate enough not to know who he is, it may be stated that Cyrus Townsend Brady is an erstwhile parson who unfrocked himself when he discovered that writing stories was a more profitable game than underwriting souls; that at once his most notable and his most blameworthy achievement was the rewriting and condensing of Samuel Warren's masterpiece, "Twenty Thousand a Year;" and that he can turn out books faster than readers can forget them.

A Thriller Founded On a Lie

The latest production of this literary piece-worker is a thriller founded on the lying story that the dying were chloroformed in Mechanics' Pavilion when the building caught fire. Of course that story was disproved by the positive statements of the surgeons and priests who were the last to leave the Pavilion, but it was a thriller ready made to Brady's hand and he dished it up with gusts for George Harvey's weekly, merely transferring the incident to a hospital full of incurable patients. The flames have surrounded the hospital, the troops are dynamiting all around it; egress, we are told, is impossible. Gathering the nurses about him, the interne issues his orders and they are attending him with the necessary implements when another surgeon joins him and helps him to kill the patients. The fact that this surgeon came from without, despite the flames and the dynamite and that he and all the nurses made their way from the doomed hospital when the wholesale chloroforming was nearly completed, makes the reader wonder why the patients couldn't have been removed instead of being murdered, but Brady doesn't write for hypercritics who demand consistency and plausibility. Finally when the interne has chloroformed the last patient, he turns the sponge towards his own nostrils and then, with a mighty effort, resists the impulse to commit suicide, resolving to be burned to death instead. Heaven, Brady tells us, is so pleased with this that he is mercifully rendered unconscious and is burned up without suffering. It does not seem to have struck Brady that if the interne's self-chloroforming under the stated conditions would have been suicide, his chloroforming of the patients would have been murder and that Heaven's interposition on behalf of a murderer was most extraordinary. But why pick flaws in a story so utterly crass and nonsensical? If it had not been founded on an incident which many people still believe to have occurred in this city it would have been beneath notice.

The Sorrows of Success

That the pursuit of fame is pleasurable pain and the possession thereof indifference goes without the saying of this Andrew Lang or that pessimist. Now comes Jack London and testifies to the same effect. While seven literary syndicates are squabbling over the honor of having discovered him, as seven cities squabbled over the honor of being the birthplace of the author of The Odyssey (not of the North), London himself, spelling success at over two cents a letter, declares to his cronies that he doesn't care a rap for art, has no sweet of the Muse's mouth, but writes, as aforetime he dug ditches, solely for the livelihood's sake. His day's work (a thousand words per diem) done, then only, like any other drudge, he begins to live. To try conclusions with the waves, either breast to breast, or with a bit of timber between contestants, gives him a taste of the wild joy of living. A prize-fight—that, rather than perfect prose, is his concern. Scratch a man, and a brute turns upon you; there (says the author of The Call of the Wild) is the naked truth, stripped of its serviceable business sack suit, or the formal black it affects on state occasions. As for him, he prefers to live among realities, and the primitive passions and the struggles they give rise to are real. If this be but a pose, it is, to say the least, preferable to that of art for art's sake.

Truth About the Suffragettes

According to correspondence from London, the average press accounts of the turmoil that has been caused in England's capital city by the struggle for women's suffrage give the merest outline of what has been happening, and do not do the women justice. It is said that the English dailies have not dared to print the real truth regarding the abuse that has been heaped upon the women leaders of this movement, who, it seems, are not all the loud-mouthed viragos that they have been pictured. There are fanatics and extremists among them, of course, but on the other hand there are many earnest women who demand equal rights without resorting to violence. In England trades unions among women are large and well organized, and among these there has been for a long time a desire for the franchise as a means of bettering their condition, but they had no leader and few friends in Parliament. The women of the unions are assessed the same as the men for sending a member to Parliament, and often he would vote against women suffrage after he got there. The acknowledged head of the movement in England at present is Miss Cristabel Pankhurst, who took first honors in international law at Victoria College. She is 26 years old, and is a daughter of the eminent barrister who in 1869 drafted for John Stuart Mill the bill which gave women municipal suffrage. Her mother is also a prominent suffragist.

Women Cruelly Treated

Although much has been written about the women attacking the arresting officers, it is said that there was only one instance of the kind. A Miss Billington was held by one policeman while she was choked black in the face by another. She lustily kicked the officers. On the other hand it is related that recently while a group of suffragists were marching along the sidewalk in orderly manner the mounted police rode in among them, knocking them down and trampling upon them, and finally arresting thirty. For questioning a candidate at a public meeting, the usual custom in England, women have been set upon and had their clothing literally torn from them, one at least having to appear in the police court without a dress. Even their sympathizers do not deny that some of the women were very disorderly, and that their conduct merited arrest and imprisonment. But the imprisonment was along Russian lines. The women were compelled to scrub stone floors on their knees and were not given a change of clothing in six weeks. In some instances they were put in cells with murderers. Their cells were infected with vermin and rats ran over them at night. They were not allowed to receive visitors or to write letters. Yet when they were liberated they began again their battle for suffrage. Ida Husted Harper, the newspaper writer who makes these statements, says that she knows from personal observation that they are true.

Chesterton's Stand Non-Committal

Gilbert Chesterton, the great English essayist and paradoxist, devotes a good deal of space to the subject of woman suffrage and makes some cogent remarks. "I do not admit for a moment," he says, "the argument which maintains that the actual suffragist leaders have an infinite right to violate the law, merely because they have no part in making it. That would give every young man of twenty years and eleven months an infinite right of breaking the law. I incline to the belief," he continues, "that a great mass of women voting just at present would make just as little difference as a great mass more of men voting would make. . . . It would be more votes, and that is all. But this means that the vote is not a reality to the great mass of people who use it already. If voting is only putting a cross opposite certain names submitted by a party caucus, then certainly women can do it as well as men, and children can do it as well as women. . . . Voting now is a thing that anyone can do, merely because it is a thing that no one cares to do. All this does not prove that votes should really be given to women. It proves that they are not really given to men."

Here's an Idea for a Novel Social Evening

An evening with Caruso!

Just think what that means! The greatest tenor the world has ever known giving his services to your guests for an entire evening—singing twenty times if you ask it. What will it cost? Ask Caruso and he will laugh at you. Ten thousand dollars wouldn't persuade Caruso to sing twenty songs for you, and still it can be done on the Victor for a trifle.

These Caruso records have done more to place the talking machine at the head of all musical instruments than any other set of records. They're truly wonderful.

The Tenderloin on the Thaw Trial

Not the least tragic aspect of the Thaw case is the incredible ease with which the affair caused not only the American public, but also the world at large, to lose all sense of proportion in matters murderous. As is not infrequently the case, the tenderloin comes to the rescue, sets us right in the matter of "values." Who but must needs smile at the spectacle of the New York gamin "piking" his pennies in a handbook on the outcome of the honest twelve's deliberations? A silver dime to seven copper cents that the jury would disagree; two nickels to one that White's slayer would go scot-free; one to four that he would be convicted—he whom the irresistible humor in that fails to save is hopelessly unbalanced. Think of the joy of the newsboy who put up his seven cents and won ten! Imagine the sorrow of the guttersnipe who was out his last four pennies, and all because the dozen "tried and true" were not as one man for conviction! What to the tenderloin is abstract justice when compared with the winning of a bet, or the losing of one? What to the American public? to the world at large? How that handbook in the unsavory street helps us to recover our lost sense of proportion, to "see the object as in itself it really is!" Two men, one woman, the shedding of a little blood—what under the sun is new in that, or in any wise worth so much paper and ink and pother?

An Appreciation of Longfellow

British reviewers are not in the habit of praising American authors, some of them refusing to acknowledge that any good can come from an American pen. Andrew Lang says that he has never read anything written this side of the Atlantic. On account of this superior attitude, it is refreshing to find in Blackwood's magazine, of Edinburgh, a fair estimate of Longfellow, who is praised by an anonymous writer with just discrimination. Still more refreshing is the grilling he gives to symbolists and decadents who sneer at Longfellow. He roasts them to a crisp and crackling finish after the following manner:

"One thing Longfellow had in common with the great poets—sincerity; and we do not mean merely that his intentions were good, or that his 'magic mirror' was nothing but his own manifest heart. His literary workmanship was sincere. Even his worst poems are written along the lines of true development of English literature. It was possible for 'Tales of a Wayside Inn' or for 'The Golden Legend' to be better written and be great. It is impossible for some of the little poetic palpitations of the latter day disciples of Verlaine or for the fluttering little fancies of Celtery to be better written, despite all their cunning and furtive avoidance in eccentricity of the real difficulties of verse; and it is also impossible that anything great should be produced in that line of work. Longfellow had none of those artificial conventions which, by supplying one with an extra vocabulary, a ready made 'strangeness' and a 'reach-me-down' renaissance of wonder, make it so easy to hide deficiencies of technical mastery, and to produce a kind of smoky, flash-light lyric, where a great poet, like Wordsworth, working in calm and splendid obedience to those laws of art 'whose service is perfect freedom,' would have revealed that power

"'Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,'

"—that power which is itself

"'The light that never was on sea or land,

The consecration, and the poet's dream.'

"The writing of most of our decadents is what Rosetti calls 'intellectually incestuous'—poetry seeking to beget its own offspring on itself. It is a much easier matter, for instance, to write about 'passionate white women' than it is to create a Cleopatra, or to reveal the beauty and passion incarnate, clothed, as it were, with the soft flesh and tender color of the verse. It is a very easy matter, indeed, in comparison with the writing even of a 'Psalm of Life,' to write a poem like this:

"Oh, passionate woman, I hear

The drip of the rain;

Your ivory body is bare!

Loosen your dream-heavy hair!

Oh, passionate woman, I hear

The drip of the rain!"

"This is, of course, extempore; but it is to be hoped that the reader will notice the 'minute ecstasy of rhythm' and subtle shifting of the accent in the fourth line; for a Celt, in editing Spenser, has recently declared it is in these little matters that the great poets of the past are so deficient. Inasmuch, too, as we followed his advice and wrote that lyric off-hand, 'in contemplative indolence, playing with fragile things,' we feel it quite as good as most of the decadent poems that are thought worthy of occupying each a page with enormous margins at the present day; and in twenty-four hours one could write, say, twenty-four feverish little volumes of such fancies, all of which would be commended by certain sections of the press. With a week's thought—we are allowing in charity the very utmost limit—half a dozen decadent books on a more elaborate scale could be produced; such books as would be greeted with would-be-morbid ecstasy by certain would-be-artistic, long-haired, anti-Philistine Bohemians and Bulgarians, with five smatterings of fifteen arts and a furtive heart-hankering after the mouth of Jenny Giaconda, Velvet Coats, and the Cities of the Plain. But it would be a very different matter to face the real difficulties of craftsmanship in verse as Longfellow faced them even when he failed. Though he never achieved the greatest, he more than once did create a poem which outweighs all the productions of these latter day symbolist, Celtic and sham archaic schools, which, nevertheless, have the impertinence to treat him with ineffable contempt—a contempt which, with the word 'Philistine' for their chief weapon, they are ludicrously endeavoring to display toward Tennyson's boots (the only part of him that is on a level with their eyes)—a contempt which soon, in their ignorance of literary history and despicable subjection to every little ebb and flow, every little action and reaction, they will be endeavoring to extend to Swinburne."

Dining At Rosina's

Do not tell me that by the fire San Francisco has lost that part of her local color typified by a foreign atmosphere; for I have dined at Rosina's, and have spent a subsequent hour over song and music there. Only four of us know of Rosina's, which we so call because of the name of the proprietor's exceedingly pretty wife, who helps him conduct the establishment. Then there is Angelo, four years old, who helps, too. He carries the empty wine glasses into the bar room after the dinner is over. They are a happy three, except that Rosina will sometimes devote herself too earnestly to the wine, both white and red. It is the mixture, I think, that makes Rosina a little ugly of temper sometimes. But her mood is usually so amiable that her husband overlooks these little lapses—so why should not we? Rosina's husband's place is a saloon that is North of Market street and East of Kearny. I will not give you more explicit directions. In the rear of the bar room is a dining room where a dozen Italian laborers of the better class eat their dinner. By the good grace of Rosina and her husband, we four are served with a meal there whenever we choose to drop in. Rosina's husband cooks it, and Rosina serves it, with anxious questions in broken English as to how we like it, and with delighted smiles at our praise, which is immediately repeated to her spouse. Then he redoubles his effort, and the omelet that follows, savory with herbs and just properly suggestive of garlic, is mellow and melting. But it is after dinner that we experience the true delight of dining at Rosina's. There is a piano in the dining room, and one of us plays it well. As might be expected, all the boarders sing. There is one of them with a sweet, strong tenor who almost weeps as he sings "La donna e mobile." Rosina likes to sing Mimi, and with a young mosaic worker as Rodolpho, she portrays well this frail heroine of Murger's. And Rosina's husband—when he elects to be the treader, and with a table cloth over his arm bellows forth the stirring lines as he struts back and forth across the room, we applaud most vigorously, Rosina leading all. Little Angelo pipes up a treble during the excitement, and altogether we are a merry crowd. I would like to

McCANN, ALLEN & CO. CONSOLIDATED

IN D. N. & E. WALTER FIRM

News of an interesting character is the recent combination of McCann, Allen & Co., the leading interior decorators of this city, and D. N. & E. Walter & Co., Van Ness and Sacramento streets.

For fifteen years McCann, Allen & Co. did most of the fine decorating work on the Coast. Their splendid reputation for artistic production was so generally admitted that they were usually consulted when fine decorations were required. It was the intention of D. N. & E. Walter & Co. to enter the retail field shortly before the fire. After that event they built their store which is not only the most commodious but the only permanent business structure on Van Ness avenue.

Mr. McCann will take charge of the decoration department and will introduce many new features in the big establishment, maintaining his former high standards in quality and style.

tell you where this place is, but I am afraid. I know of long-haired people who would paint frescoes on the walls. They would have the guests' table at which we four eat, thrust into the middle of the room, where they might be observed, and would make the place a fad. Rosina's husband would not be content with the patronage of his regular boarders, and, inflated over his popularity, would double the price of his meals. I have seen such things done before.

Mizner As a Rag Time Thespian

Wilson Mizner's sudden fancy to essay the stage for histrionic laurels and their attendant perquisites is no new resolution on his part. Some half dozen years ago when he was startling local society with Lehresque stunts he occasionally gave the goddesses of comedy and tragedy a mad, mad whirl, and his applauding friends always stoutly declared that he was the limelight Garrick of his decade. At that time there was a notably lively colony of Bohemians living along the rim of Russian hill and nothing delighted Mizner more than to organize the vaudeville practices with which they delighted their friends. They styled themselves "The Six Sharp Shockers" and it was their particular delight to "make up" in some uncouth and startling fashion, put on concealing great coats and descend unexpectedly on the house of some friend, where a grand dinner or other form of conventional evening entertainment was in progress. Of course with the advent of the "Sharp Shockers" and their grotesque, banjoesque entertainment all formality went to the winds and frolic gleefully took every hurdle offered it. Mizner was the leading spirit in these peripathetic mansion storming forays and when he left town for pastures new the "hill crowd" dropped their "rag time" pranks.

Mad With Tenor-Worship

New York is just now suffering with an affliction of tenor madness. Caruso started it with the result that he is charged with being a menace to the cause of good music. Bonci, his rival, has not attained to such a height of popularity but he is said to equal Caruso in everything but the full quality and volume of voice. Caruso is called a fad and pronounced overrated. Jean de Reszke was a fad but, unlike the lucky Caruso, he was not overrated. Competent critics affirm that de Reszke could sing Italian roles almost as enchantingly as Caruso sing them; he could sing better—and act—French roles infinitely better; and he was the greatest interpreter of the Wagnerian roles, in which Caruso would appear to disadvantage. Caruso's art, though extremely fine in parts, is pronounced lamentably limited. His loud singing is declared to be a sure sign of decline of voice. The discussion has led to the interesting conundrum. Why is it the tenor and so rarely the baritone or basso who is worshipped? One would expect women to be more deeply interested in the manliest voice. The consensus of opinion seems to be that the composers are largely responsible for tenor-worship, as with hardly an exception the tenor plays a more important part than the baritone or bass.

fact is interesting, as arguing either the remarkable versatility of our theatrical appraisers or their cunning in simulating an enthusiasm which they do not feel. Far be it from me to pass judgment on the inward workings of the minds which regulate the dramatic tastes of the local newspapers; but it may in all modesty be pointed out, without doing injustice to their scholarly attainments and their classical predilections, that theirs is not exactly the attitude toward the revival of the Greek drama current among critics of wider renown, if not of more skillful pens. Surely the censors of the drama will pardon comparison with, let us say, Max Beerbohm who performs for the Saturday Review of London the same important function which is so ably taken care of in this city by the gentlemen whose names pleasantly recur with every Tuesday morning and whose utterances are weighed week after week in the delicate scales of the critical first-nighter. Max Beerbohm, be it known, is not unreservedly committed to the revival of Greek plays and when he chances to yawn during the production of one of them he has no shame in confessing that fact to all the world. London has not had the "Eumenides" lately as we have but it has just tasted "The Persians" in translation. Beerbohm may be presumed to know his Aeschylus as well, at the very least, as our local dramatic critics and yet it was with very mixed feelings that he went away from the production given by the cultured Literary Theatre Society.

Beerbohm's Amazing Confession

It would be difficult to imagine one of our own critics treating the old Greek in the cavalier fashion adopted by Beerbohm. "The play was originally produced in Athens," says the breezy Max, "some few years after the battle of Salamis. And I doubt not that, had I been alive then, I should have enjoyed it. To say that I enjoyed it last Saturday would be to make a too great demand on the goodwill I bear for the Literary Theatre Society." Now such an utterance as that would be impossible to one of our critics. Put it down to lack of courage, hatred of philistinism, or what you will, but none of them would dream of so doing violence to the soul of the old master whose play was given at Berkeley this week. "'The Persians' bore you and me," continues Beerbohm. Did the "Eumenides" bore any of our enlightened analyzers of playcraft? Judging from their ecstasies it filled them with a joy unspeakable, bathed their thirsty souls in the purest stream from Hippocrene and gave them inspiration for renewed strivings in behalf of the stage with all its works and pomps. What are we of this edge of the world to think when the demands of dramatic criticism align Max Beerbohm on one side and our own phalanx of pen-wielders on the other? Here is a question not easily answered without doing less than justice to one side in the controversy, so caution dictates a suspended judgment and no doubt charity will approve the resulting reticence.

Motive Suggested for Anderson's Suit

Anyone who has followed the trouble that has existed for some time between the College of Physicians and Surgeons and the State Board of Medical Examiners will have little trouble in discerning the motive back of the suit for libel that Dr. Winslow Anderson, President of the college mentioned, has brought against Dr. Dudley Tait and Dr. Philip Mills Jones. For years, as a leading member of the State Board of Medical Examiners, Tait has fought Dr. Anderson's college. Verbally, and through the State Medical Journal, which is edited by Dr. Jones, he has asserted that the college is not properly conducted; that pupils are granted diplomas without having gone through the requisite course of study; and that pupils who have been away in Alaska prospecting for gold mines have been credited, during their absence, with having attended the college. All these charges Dr. Tait offers to prove with documentary evidence. It is ostensibly because of these assertions that Anderson has brought his libel suit for $75,000, but another reason may be suggested without straining plausibility. Within a short time Governor Gillett is to choose five physicians to represent the allopaths on the State Board of Medical Examiners. Dr. Tait is a prominent candidate, and is not without opposition from other physicians who want to be on the Board. It can readily be seen that a libel suit brought at the present time would do much to discredit him. Nothing would please Anderson better than to have his persistent enemy kept off the Board.

press agency has spread the reports of her vagaries. Her latest eccentricity comes to light through a suit brought by Heineman, the English publisher, against the tragedienne in connection with the autobiography which she contracted to write for his house. Heineman expected to receive a genuine account of the actress' eventful career which has taken her into every land and into the society of the world's greatest people. He had visions, when he contracted with her, of a book which would rival the notorious "Sarah Barnum" brochure by which Marie Columbiere vented her spite on Bernhardt. But Sarah had no intention of baring her life to the world through the medium of an English publishing house and instead of a throbbing journal in time he received what in his disgust he designates "stale scrap book stuff," press agent yarns and apocryphal anecdotes flung together on the plan of earthquake histories and other such catchpenny devices. Now he demands that the contract be carried out in spirit as well as in letter but Bernhardt who insists on following her whims in everything, refuses to alter her work and as she seems never to have any money, despite her enormous earnings, it is difficult to see what Heineman will gain by his suit unless it be a vindication of himself in the eyes of the public.

Sarah's Literary Assimilation

In connection with the Bernhardt and her authorship there comes to mind an amusing story told by Vance Thompson to illustrate her capacity for benevolent assimilation in the literary line. One Christmas while Thompson was on a New York paper he was commissioned by his editor to get a special Christmas article from Bernhardt who was appearing in the city at the time. She assented at once to the request and referred Thompson to her secretary. "Let me have a copy in French as soon as possible," said the suave secretary. "A Copy!" and "In French!" exclaimed the amazed Thompson. "Why yes, she will want to read it before she signs it," was the matter-of-fact answer. Then Thompson understood; so he took a day off and wrote the Christmas story, afterwards translating it into French. The French version was presented to the secretary, approved by the "authoress," and both copies, French and English, duly authenticated by her bold dashing signature, appeared in the Christmas edition. A decade later Thompson visited Bernhardt at her home in Paris. Amongst the landscapes, battle pictures, aquarelles, portraits, statuettes and other artistic productions of the great actress was an edition de luxe with Bernhardt's name on the cover. It was his story. As he looked over his forgotten work Bernhardt came in. "Oh," she exclaimed, "have you read it? A little thing but real. It was an event in my own life that haunted me and haunted me until I simply had to write it—a fragment of my childhood. Ah, those days, those days!" And no doubt she believed it as much as she believes anything else.

Miss Joan Baldwin's little pupil, Irene Hirshfeld, gave a piano recital on Thursday of last week at Lyric Hall that showed her to be the possessor of a goodly amount of talent for that instrument. A few seasons more of work under Miss Baldwin's capable direction will doubtless make an excellent pianiste of the child who seems ambitious as well as talented.

At the Head of Fashion's Class

—that's where this store has been for many years, and where it will continue to be.

There are twenty-four departments to this store and we aim to have our organization balanced to such a nicety as to suggest the working of a perfect time-piece that completes its circle each day and gives to each of its twenty-four sections its exact due.

This means that each wheel, each cog, each bearing must be perfect. It means that every detail must speak of the hour in which we are living—the style, the expediency, the quality, the price, the store methods; everything must be right, from the maker till the purchase is giving you perfect satisfaction.

Clothes-Crush at Fairmont

The promenade concert at the Fairmont on Tuesday night was first and last a clothes-crush. One heard the shriek of animated color above the clang of the music. People stood in gay groups and discussed each other with magnificent unreserve. We pat ourselves on the back (particularly when it is décolleté) as a musical people and have learned to take our opera bolt upright, with only a glance out of the tail of an eye at the chiffons; but the promenade concert was a wild orgie of silk and satin and lace and no one made the slightest pretense of listening to the music. The same motif ran through every refrain that drifted my way, "Isn't that a fright" or "Oh what a stunner" and the loud pedal on all the while. Mrs. Alexander Hamilton in a striking cerise gown with a black velvet Juliet cap and a bunch of aigrettes in her hair was one of the most conspicuous figures in the promenade. A procession of dressmakers and milliners trailed after her most of the evening and I heard one remark, "If I could only see how that sleeve was cut!"

Ned Hugged the Background

The ballroom, which is the largest San Francisco has ever boasted, was so jammed with people that just a little "ring around the rosie" circle was left for the waltzers. Ned Greenway kept so effectively in the background that he could easily prove an alibi. However, even the dancers, who were obviously not in the Greenway set, refrained from indulging in the "bunny hug" so the genial Ned did not have to come forth from his hiding place and issue "break away" commands.

Receipts Broke All Records

Never in the history of San Francisco has so much money been netted in a single night for charity. Evidently we are just bulging with wealth, if this promenade may be taken as a marker. The treasurer's report of this affair will make the Eastern charitable organizations sit up and gasp. Ten thousand dollars was recently netted at a Newport society function when all the fashionables performed and yet out on this Western rim and just "one year after" over twice that sum was realized.

He Washes His Own Machine

Economy stalks the confines of the wealthy in a guise that the unashamed economist would never recognize. Just now Burlingame is cackling over the frugal device practiced by a young married couple whose social position is out of joint with their allowance. Of course they have to have an automobile but they drive the car themselves and save the wages of a mahout. One can keep up a neat little fiction about preferring to drive one's own car and society may not read between the lines. But when it was bruited about that the young husband gets up at the peep of dawn and washes down his own machine all snobdom shuddered. When a neighbor verified the rumor the snobs translated this daily scrubbing fest into a scandal. Evidently the man who sponges off his own car has far less caste than the man who constantly "sponges" a ride with his friends. From the amount of tongue wagging over the affair one might fancy that to play the hose in your own backyard is equivalent to owning a mixed assortment of family skeletons.

Her Covert Compliment to Hubby

However this attitude of the satin-back Blingumites who live on velvet is not more remarkable than the subterfuges practiced by the young couple themselves. The sheer fact that they are ashamed of having to practice this damp economy pricks all argument in defense of their washing down the car. The young wife makes it a point to tell all her friends that she has such a "trustworthy man who comes in the morning to put the car in order."

To those who make a decent attempt at "right living and clear thinking" the wobbly pretenses of the socially ambitious are inexcusable and unexplainable. With a scant income and inflated social ambition it is necessary to draw the line somewhere and rather than dispense with some of the fluffs and fol de rols which modish fashion demands these butterfly chasers practice some sort of economy under the rose and shamefacedly try to cover up their tracks.

Mrs. McNear's Versatility

There are several wealthy society women who are not ashamed of performing duties which their less straightforward acquaintances would never acknowledge. Of course the fact that one can afford to pay for having a thing done removes the sting of forced economy. But I fancy women like Mrs. Fred McNear would peel off all pretense if circumstances made a necessity as well as a virtue of their capabilities. Mrs. McNear is the most versatile of the Hopkins sisters and can do almost anything from cutting a pigeon wing on skates to cutting her babies' hair. After the fire, when hairdressers were scattered beyond beck and call, Mrs. McNear courageously strapped on her shears and gave the baby a "Dutch cut" that had just the proper chopped appearance infantile bangs demand. Ever since she has been cutting the youngster's hair herself. "Why pay for having it done when I can do it just as well as a professional?" she frankly asks. Mrs. McNear can make a frock that has style stitched into every seam. There are other women in her set who ply a needle very deftly, but I believe she is the only society woman who can cut a youngster's hair a la mode without showing any amateurish patches.

An exhibition of paintings of Indian Life by Grace Hudson will be held from April 17th to 27th at the Schussler gallery, 1218 Sutter street.
